"Much. . . . Yes. You're sober, now; you've been sober most of a week. There's a little rifle yonder. In that birch sits a grouse. If you weren't ashamed to show how shaky you still are you'd try to get him because you're hungry. When you are able to take your living from the country, we'll feed. Not before. I can stand it longer than you can."

After a time he said:

"I'm glad you're ashamed."

"Go to h—l!"

LaFane smoked on.

"He was depending on you and you turned him down. Think of that! An old man, laid up with smashed bones, his back to the wall, and you turned him down. . . . I recall how gentle he always was with kids. I should think they'd break their necks to do things for him."

"Shut up!" the boy snapped and averted his face.

"No. I'll keep reminding you of it, and of what you might have been able to do to me, and of what you can do for him and to me if you make up your mind to it. A fine man, your father; not the kind most men would turn down. . . ."

Young Jim winced and LaFane's lips twitched as if he wanted to smile.

CHAPTER VII

Down into the rushing maw of the river went Franz. Spray lashed his face, the canoe bucked and reared like a frightened, living creature. He grazed a rock and although the touch was light the jolt all but upset him. He shot between protruding boulders with scarcely a hand's breadth to spare and straightened out for the run down a stretch that was white from cliff to cliff.

He was forced to work frantically to keep himself in shallows because protruding rocks were so thick outside that no craft could thread them. He skirted a lodged tree top, canoe rasping through the outer branches without disaster, but was turned crosswise of the current.

For a long moment it seemed as though the pull of the river would defy his efforts to straighten out and that the canoe surely must capsize, but he put into the paddle every energy of his splendid body. The bow responded, swinging slowly at first . . swinging faster, threatening by that spin to bash the one rock with even a greater vigor than the current alone could have impelled. But he won. Won by inches. He straightened out, slipped past and was in safe water.

At the foot of the rapid a big eddy swirled monotonously. As Franz came abreast the eddy, his jaw dropped because along its outer edge, beside a half-submerged log, floated a heavily listed, water-weighted canoe.

He altered his course and went close, saw the shattered bottom where a rock had impaled the water-weighted craft, observed the Polaris star branded on the bow and let a long breath slip through his lips.

"So!" he said and laughed, somewhat uncertainly. "So, Young Jim Flynn, or whoever-you-are! Old Twenty-Mile got you, eh? You, and your d—d option!"

Meanwhile, along the trail that led through the timber out to the Shoestring road, Steve Drake covered the miles at a woodsman's swift pace. At dawn he entered Shoestring and breakfasted. Inquiry developed no news of Franz. He had a moment of wonder, of doubt. If the other had met death in the rapid . . . But he shrugged that off. To prevent his arrival here Franz would have shot him down without compunction, concerned only with escaping suspicion for such an act.

Later, he lingered in the register's office until he saw that the entry had been properly made and then, drawing the first really long breath it seemed he had enjoyed since he first stepped into the store at Good-Bye and picked up the gage hurled by Old Jim Flynn's enemies, he walked down to the telegraph office. Franz, thwarted, might try for vengeance, now, but all he could do would be to harm Steve Drake's body, and that was a trifling consideration.

* * * * * * * *

"Sleep well?" LaFane asked that morning.

"No,"—shortly.

"I heard you rolling around. A boy in your shape, who's done to himself and his father what you have done, shouldn't expect to sleep very—"

"For the love of God, LaFane, won't you please let up?"

Honest appeal was in both voice and gesture. Tears showed in his eyes and his breath caught. Slowly his hands which had been wide spread dropped to his sides, his head hung and he turned away.

For an interval the older man watched him. Then he walked close. He put a hand on the boy's shoulder and gripped it tightly.

"Look at me, son," he said and his tone was most gentle. "Look at me. . . . That's right! And listen to this: It was all you had left, your sense of the decent thing. It almost got away but you hung to it. You've got it, now; it's yours; for keeps. If you hate me, I'm sorry. But you won't have much longer to endure me. That's a promise. As soon as the last shake is gone, we go. The job waiting is not one for a man who isn't steady as a rock!"

Young Jim stared at him and his lip twisted as he fought back emotion.

"I don't hate you," he said quietly. "I'm only hating myself . . . the myself that was!"

Busily, then, the other began dumping the contents of the grub sack on the rock. He smiled serenely as he cooked that hearty breakfast.

* * * * * * * *

Steve Drake wrote his telegram to Kate Flynn with great care. He told all that had happened as briefly as was possible but re-read it carefully to be certain that no word important to the proposed transaction had been omitted.

His last line was:

"This deal is only way out. Money must be in MacDonald's hands Thursday at four p. m."

To the operator, he said: "Send that. And I'll wait right here until an answer comes."

* * * * * * * *

Butter would not melt in Franz's mouth at times, McNally had said. And this day was one of those occasions. He stood on a high point beside the Laird and showed him where he had found Steve Drake's canoe.

He spoke in a hushed tone, as one does of tragedy. He led the old man slowly to where the wrecked craft was beached and there MacDonald stood with bared head while tears ran down his wrinkled cheeks.

"Oh, a gude lad he was! A fine, gude lad. 'Nd a grand angler. . . . Why . . . Why'd he chance th' rapid?"

Franz debated with himself craftily.

"The queer part of it all, Mr. MacDonald, is that the fellow was not Young Jim Flynn. The real Young Jim was drunk over on Moose lake when this fellow showed up and passed himself off for the one they'd been expecting. He admitted it to me but I didn't think it was any of my affair so I said nothing to any one."

"But who was he? What was he doin'?"

"I can't answer that. Who he was doesn't matter. What he was doing here I could only guess."

MEMORIAL BUILT OVER CANAL IN OLD ST. QUENTIN

An unusual American war memorial in France, says the National Geographic Magazine, is the Bellicourt monument, built over a section of the old St. Quentin canal. Just north of the city of St. Quentin, in the region of the Somme, the canal flows through a historic tunnel used by the Germans in the Hindenburg line defenses. The monument commemorates the activities of the Twenty-seventh and Thirtieth divisions, forming the Second corps, which went into the front line with the British army to attack the formidable Hindenburg line.

On this part of the front the Hindenburg line followed roughly the St. Quentin canal, and made use of that obstacle as a primary feature of its defense system. For more than three miles the canal flows through a tunnel, which the enemy converted into a huge underground shelter and storehouse.

They dug comfortable bomb-proof rooms into the tunnel walls, and by means of numerous passageways maintained communication with their machine-gun nests and trenches above ground. Canal boats, tied up in the tunnel afforded other living quarters and a fully protected magazine for supplies.

Altogether, it was one of their strongest places of defense, but on September 29, 1918, when the offensive was launched, the famous Hindenburg line cracked under the blow. Both American and British losses, however, were severe.

Other American units—the Thirty-third and Eightieth divisions and the Sixth and Eleventh Engineer regiments—also served with the British armies in this part of France.

The monument commemorating these several activities stands atop the ridge directly over the tunnel that links the Somme and Escaut. This old subterranean water route was begun back in 1769 and, after several interruptions, was completed in 1810, at the order of Napoleon I.

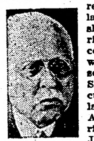
Insull, Brought Back for Trial, Defends Himself—Russia Resents Being Declared a Defaulter—Chamber of Commerce Criticizes New Deal.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

SAMUEL INSULL, once the grand old man of public utilities, has been brought home to be tried for his alleged sins after his long period of refuge in foreign lands. His "prison ship," the Exilona, arrived off Fort Hancock, N. J., and Insull was taken off at open sea by the United States coast guard cutter Hudson, which landed him quickly. After an automobile ride to Princeton Junction, he was put aboard a train and transported swiftly to Chicago. His son, Samuel Insull, Jr., had been permitted to join him on the Exilona and accompanied him on the trip west.



Samuel Insull

Landing on American soil, Insull appeared to recover his old time confidence. To reporters he said: "I am in America to make the most important fight of my life. I am fighting not only for freedom but for complete vindication. I have erred, but my greatest error was in underestimating the effects of the financial panic on American securities, and particularly on the companies I was trying to build.

"I worked with all my energy to save those companies. I made mistakes—but they were honest mistakes. They were errors in judgment, but not dishonest manipulations.

"Arbitrarily, I had been instructed to resign as head of these companies which I had built and which I had tried to protect.

"I was told that I was no longer needed. Tired from the fruitless struggles to save the investments of thousands of men and women, discouraged in my attempts to save the investments of my friends and associates as well as everything I had, I got out.

"No charges were brought against me until I had been away for three months. My return at that time would have further complicated the problems of the reorganization of the companies.

"The whole story has not yet been told. You only know the charges of the prosecution. Not one word has been uttered in even feeble defense of me. And it must be obvious that there also is my side of the story.

"When it is told in court, my judgment may be discredited, but certainly my honesty will be vindicated."

RUSSIA has been angered by a ruling of Attorney General Cummings and there is danger that all the plans for re-establishing trade with that country will go awry. Mr. Cummings was called on to determine what nations would be barred by the Johnson act from marketing their securities in this country or in any way receiving financial assistance. This he did by announcing the six foreign nations that are not in default to the United States government on their obligations. These are Finland, Great Britain, Czechoslovakia, Italy, Latvia and Lithuania. Finland has met in full all installments on its war debt. The others have made token payments on recent installments.

By inference, these nations are considered in default: Greece, France, Austria, Belgium, Estonia, Germany, Hungary, Poland and Jugoslavia. Russia, Armenia and Nicaragua have not paid, but their debts have not been funded.

Soviet Russia fell in the default class because it ignored obligations of the preceding czarist and Kerensky governments. The czars sold bonds totaling $86,000,000 in America and the brief Kerensky regime borrowed $187,000,000 from the United States treasury.

Dispatches from Moscow said the resentful Russians were likely to take retaliatory steps in the form of a recommendation that all Soviet economic organizations refrain from planning any orders from America with the exception of such items as cannot be had elsewhere. This recommendation was made recently by the organ of the commissariat of heavy industry and, it is understood, already has been put into effect.

The Soviet government insists it cannot be held liable for the Kerensky debts. A possible explanation of the Soviet attitude—which is summed up in the press with the statement that the government will not be coerced into a Kerensky debt settlement—lies in the fact that if it consents to negotiate the question with America, it will be compelled under the Rapallo treaty to consider German claims for payment of pre-Bolshevik debts to that country on a basis of equal terms.

GREAT BRITAIN and Japan are on the verge of a big trade war. The British have threatened to take strong action to protect their textile export interests against increasing Japanese competition, although the British government officially declares it will do everything to maintain amicable relations with Japan. The official position in Tokyo is that Japan can take care of herself, and there was every indication that it would not yield to the British ultimatum that it must modify its trade program and tactics. The British threat was that quotas would be imposed on Japanese goods, but trade leaders in Tokyo said this would not hurt their country seriously, especially since Japan's imports from the British Isles in 1933 totaled 83,000,000 yen or almost as much as was exported there, 80,000,000 yen. Hence, they said, the Tokyo government would be able to make reprisals.

Trade with the British dominions is considered far more important and the Japanese are confident the dominions will not follow the mother country's lead—especially Australia, which sold to Japan in 1933 four times its purchases, and Canada, which sold seven times as much as it bought.

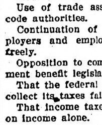
ACCORDING to the unanimous report of a house committee of investigation, Maj. Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois, chief of the army air corps, acted "in clear violation of existing law" in the proposed purchase of airplanes costing $7,500,000.

Coupled with the criticism of Foulois was a commendation of Harry H. Woodring, assistant secretary of war.

The report stated that late in 1933 the Public Works administration set aside $7,500,000 for the purchase of army airplanes. It asserted that Foulois had decided to buy the planes, without competition, from the Northrup corporation, the Boeing Airplane company and the Glenn L. Martin company. On Woodring's insistence, the plan for direct purchases was dropped and specifications drawn on which competitive bids were asked.

PLANS of the Home Owners Loan corporation provide that building companies must be under the Blue Eagle to obtain any of the $200,000,000 worth of business which the government will create in extending aid for reconditioning homes, including those on which the government takes over the mortgages.

RESOLUTIONS declaring that the New Deal is destructive of American liberties and dangerous to business were adopted by the United States Chamber of Commerce at the closing session of its annual meeting in Washington. This despite the fact that President Roosevelt had warned the members of the organization to quit crying wolf and to support his recovery program. However, the resolutions were mildly worded and there was in them no outspoken condemnation of the major components of the New Deal.



Gen. Johnson

Chief among the resolutions adopted were those urging:

Extensions of the temporary deposit insurance plan.

Modification of the securities act.

Use of trade associations as NRA code authorities.

Continuation of the right of employers and employees to negotiate freely.

Opposition to compulsory unemployment benefit legislation.

That the federal government should collect its taxes fairly.

That income taxes should be levied on income alone.

That exemption of farmers, who trade their wheat for flour, from the wheat processing tax should be abolished.

At a dinner Gen. Hugh S. Johnson was the chief guest and after his address he submitted to an inquisition on the present and prospective policies of the NRA. Asked directly if the principles embodied in the recovery act were to be permanent, he replied:

"If there has been any good demonstrated by the recovery act, it will live and it ought to live; if there has been any bad it will die and it ought to die."

Admitting that there has been a lapse in public interest and enthusiasm, the general said a new campaign to make the nation Blue Eagle conscious was being mapped. He also admitted that the controversy between labor and industry is becoming more acute. He expressed the opinion that the ideal relationship between labor and management had been worked out in the bituminous coal industry.

JUST a few hours before General Johnson had spoken in high praise of the bituminous coal settlement, Federal District Judge Charles I. Dawson in Louisville held unconstitutional the code arranged for that industry, as applied to local business, and granted a temporary injunction restraining the government from forcing the code upon unwilling operators in western Kentucky.

The operators, who claim to have $50,000,000 invested in the mines, chiefly in Hopkins, Muhlenberg, Union and Webster counties, protested vigorously when the code recently was formulated providing for $4.60 a day for seven hours work. Prior to that the scale was $4 for eight hours work. Most of their mines were shut down more than a month ago.

Old Chart Believed Copy of One Columbus Made

Startled to find the name Columbus mentioned on an old Turkish map of the Atlantic ocean, Paul Kahle has subjected the map to closest study, finding on it important new clues to the discovery of America.

In a report on his investigations, published in the Geographical Review, the official organ of the American Geographical society, Doctor Kahle announces his belief that for the first time geographers have an idea of the appearance of the map which served to guide Columbus on his first voyage.

"We are now in a position even to reconstruct this map to a certain extent," he declares.

No maps indisputably drawn by Columbus himself are known in existence today. The maps which he undoubtedly drew to show the king and queen of Spain where lay the fine lands he had found in their honor have vanished. Nor have searches ever revealed any chart by which the navigator steered his course on the world's most famous voyages of discovery. Hence the importance of the Turkish map, which appears to be a direct copy of one of the lost maps by Columbus. By translating the long Arabic inscriptions on the map, Doctor Kahle found that it was made for the Sultan Selim I, in 1513, and it specifically states that new lands are shown as added lately by the "Genoese infidel Colon-bo."

In quaint language, the Turkish map maker told the story of Columbus' discovery voyages, and declared that he followed a map by Columbus himself in drawing these new lands. The source of his information was a Spanish slave who had traveled three times with Columbus on his long voyages.

The map made for the sultan has lain undetected in the seraglio at Constantinople for centuries. Its discovery has stimulated interest in seeking the original Columbus map which the mapmaker copied and which may have been preserved in Turkey. Some months ago the American ambassador to Turkey, requested a search. A high Turkish official sent a circular letter to directors of museums in the country and to scholars studying Turkish maritime history, asking their assistance. So far no trace of the original map has been reported.—Kansas City Star's Science Service.

BLACKLEGOL is the first blackleg vaccine ever produced which can be recommended definitely for ONE SHOT immunization of suckling calves. Immunity with Blacklegol is equivalent to that of smallpox vaccine against smallpox ...the highest immunity produced by means of a vaccine. It has been amply proved by thousands of laboratory and field tests to be far superior to any other vaccines on the market... BAR NONE!

Without the final step in its production it is a better product, and when that final step is taken comparison within the same standards ceases to exist. That step is the addition of a chemical which precipitates its immunity-producing substances (antigens), slowing up their absorption after injection. By thus retarding release of the antigens, the animal's system is enabled to build immunity against the entire injection, whereas much of the ordinary vaccine is excreted before the calf's mechanism has been able to build immunity against it. To state it in other words, it would require several injections of the ordinary type of vaccine to build an immunity equivalent to that produced by one shot of Blacklegol.

MORE THAN 50% LONGER NON-SKID MILEAGE

IN THE NEW Firestone HIGH SPEED TIRE FOR 1934

THE new Firestone High Speed Tire for 1934 is the greatest tire Firestone has ever built. With its wider, flatter tread, greater thickness, deeper non-skid, more and tougher rubber, and greater non-skid contact with the road, you get more than 50% longer non-skid mileage.

This new development is made possible by the Firestone patented process of Gum-Dipping, whereby the cotton fibers inside the high stretch cords are soaked and coated with pure liquid rubber. This provides greater strength, safety and blowout protection.

Firestone engineers pioneered and developed the first successful balloon tire in 1923, and it is only natural that Firestone would lead in the further development of tire construction to meet the demands of the high-powered high-speed cars of today.

The new Firestone High Speed tires for 1934, have already proved their worth by constant testing on the Firestone fleet of test cars over all kinds of roads and highways throughout the United States.

Firestone High Speed tires are further subjected to the most severe tests known on the greatest proving ground in the world—the Indianapolis Speedway. In fact, Firestone Tires have been on the winning cars in the annual 500-Mile Indianapolis Race for fourteen consecutive years — conclusive evidence of Firestone's outstanding leadership in tire development and construction.

Performance RECORDS FIRESTONE HIGH SPEED TIRES

—for fourteen consecutive years have been on the winning cars in the 500 - mile Indianapolis Race.

—for seven consecutive years have been on the winning cars in the daring Pike's Peak climb where a slip meant death.

—for three consecutive years have been on the 181 buses of the Washington, (D. C.) Railway and Electric Company, covering 11,357,810 bus miles without one minute's delay due to tire trouble.

—were on the Neiman Motors' Ford V-8 Truck that made a new coast-to-coast record of 67 hours, 45 minutes, 30 seconds actual running time.

County Key Bankers

Describing the activities of the Agricultural Commission of the American Bankers Association, the Director, D. H. Otis, says: "With 2,500 agriculturally minded bankers, designated as county key bankers, there is enlisted a tremendous force for the improvement of agriculture. These key bankers bring organized assistance to progressive bankers, who are led to see the possibility of agricultural work in their communities. Banker-farmer tours are emphasized as a means of acquainting bankers, farmers and other business men with first-hand knowledge of how agricultural improvement methods are working out in practice. These give an opportunity for the key bankers to contact country bankers and work out new ideas."

Regrading Range Line

A crew of several men and seven teams are now at work on the reconstruction of the range line four miles east to town. They started work on Monday at the south end near the river and will work north. Otto Johnson commissioner from this district informed us that he had secured $2400 for this job and that it would all be done by men and teams. Being as it takes quite a bit to fix this road it is hard to say just how many miles of it can be gone over for this amount of money. The crews are allowed to work only two weeks each. The crew that is on now and the one that comes on next to make it fourteen men and teams in all will work until June 10th. Then another crew of same size will go on for two weeks according to Wm. Paskewitz who has hired some of the teams here for the job.

The members of the two town circles held an outdoor picnic at the G. Sanoden home on Monday evening. The proceeds from the picnic will be used to buy dishes for the church.

Mrs. Ole Hamerness Died

(From our Rosewood reporter)

Mrs. Ole Hamerness, 42 year old mother of six children was laid to rest at the Rindal cemetery on Tuesday afternoon, after only a weeks illness of pneumonia, death coming peacefully at a Warren hospital on the morning of May 26.

Mrs. Hamerness, nee Thilda Hagen was a native of this place and a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. P. P. Hagen pioneer farmers north of town. Born on Sept. 4th, 1862 she received both common and religious education at this place, and was in 1911 united in marriage to Edwin Sjosvold, who died in 1914, leaving the wife with two small children, Peter and Thelma. In 1922 she was re-married to Mr. Hamerness her surviving husband then a garageman at Holt and they made their home there for about five years, when they purchased the former Mrs. Ranum farm and have been residents there since. To this union was born six children, four of whom survive, three girls Olivia, Pearl and Opal and one boy Orvis. Both her aged parents and two sisters Mrs. Lawrence Pederson and Mrs. Martin Jarshaw and three brothers Carl, Willie and Olaf Hagen all residents of this place.

Mrs. Hamerness had been in failing health for about one year, but was about the home until one week previous to her death when she contracted pneumonia, and was taken to a Thief River Falls hospital, but was later transferred to Warren for treatment and where death.

At the funeral the following acted as pall bearers: Arthur Olson, Hans Ness, Joseph, Lewis and Albert Alby and Olaf Hall. Memorial services were held at the Rindal church Rev. Tungseth officiating and interment taking place in that cemetery.

Drouth Increases Hay Demand

Because of the critical drouth conditions in practically all parts of Minnesota and in the two Dakotas, there is an unusually large demand for the leasing of state lands for hay and pasture purposes. F. A. Wildes, Director of the Division of Lands and Minerals, stated that the many requests for these forms of leases all indicate the drouth seriousness particularly in Northwestern Minnesota and in Eastern North and South Dakota.

Information relative to lands available for lease to provide hay and pasture can be secured by writing the Lands and Minerals Division, St. Paul, or R. Ray Krois, State Squatter Agent, Hibbing, in charge of all state agricultural lands. District appraisers are T. J. Welsh, Thief River Falls, northwestern district; F. B. Getchell, Bemidji, central district; J. C. Long, at Cloquet, eastern district.

"To illustrate the drastic measures that farmers in the drouth-stricken areas must resort to, in several instances groups of farmers are joining together to move their cattle to places where grazing lands are available," Mr. Wildes said.

Appointed by Governor Olson on February 28, 1934.

When Judge Julius J. Olson was named as Associate Justice of the State Supreme Court, I was appointed by Governor Floyd B. Olson as Judge Olson's successor, and since that time have served in that position. I have filed as a candidate for District Judge at the June Primary Election.

Owing to official work I have little time to devote to the campaign and must therefore depend on such voluntary interest as my friends and supporters will give in my behalf.

During the time I have been permitted to serve as a District Judge it has been my endeavor to do so fairly and impartially, and if privileged to continue for a full term, I trust my attitude on the bench shall always be just and fair.

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, whom Drake has robbed. Flynn forgives the theft, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spree. Hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters, finding Franz plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Franz in a fist fight, the Polaris crew assumes that Drake is Flynn's son, and he takes charge, as "Young Jim." A photograph of Kate, which Steve finds, intrigues him immensely. Steve gains the friendship of LaFane, woods scout. Franz discovers Drake's impersonation. Threatened with disclosure, Steve accuses Franz of attempting to murder him, exhibiting evidence, and the man dare not act. Steve sends LaFane to find Young Jim and sober him up. Steve wins the friendship of MacDonald, who owns timber land vital to the Flynn interests and the Scotsman gives him an option for Polaris to buy his timber. Knowing of the giving of the option, and wanting the timber for a rival company, Franz plans to put Steve out of the way, but the latter outwits him.

He said that significantly and the Laird stared at him in sharp query.

"My guess would be this: that Flynn tried to buy from you and had gotten nowhere, that he knew his son was a worthless bum, that he found this fellow who makes a good enough appearance and who surely is a darned good fisherman and sent him in here with the deliberate purpose of winning your confidence and friendship."

"Ye think so? Ye think that, lad? . . . I wonder . . ." An irate gleam commenced to show in the Laird's eyes. "Queer happenin's, queer things. Ah, I'm sick of it all! Age rides heavy on th' shoulders! A great relief I felt when I signed his option but if he's gone, ut's gone wi' him 'nd I've got th' timber back again! If Jim Flynn's a smart trickster, no more will I have to do wi' him but I've th' property back noo 'nd just when I'd commenced to reckon on other investments."

It was Franz's opportunity, his hour snatched from what happened to have been defeat yesterday. Cleverly he played his cards. Each word he spoke was well calculated. They walked back to the Laird's where the old man paced the room while Franz listened in evident sympathy and waited. . . waited.

His waiting was rewarded and, at dawn, he started for Shoestring himself, an option in his possession. He presented his document to the register of deeds and watched that worthy scratch his head as he read it.

"Well, that's the second option on that description!" he declared.

"Second!" Franz's voice was shrill.

"Sure. Young Jim Flynn was in yesterday with it. He waited around town until this noon for a telegram."

"But . . . Why, he couldn't . . . He's . . ."

But ghosts do not transact business. He had been thwarted again but his agile mind grasped one shred of hope.

"His was a seven-day option, wasn't it?"

"Yes. Dated Thursday."

"Record this, then. It's for fifteen."

He went out of the building and walked slowly to the edge of town, throwing himself down under a tree and trying to plan. Telegrams had been exchanged between Shoestring and Chicago relating to this transaction. Now, if a man could know what instructions those messages contained . . .

Down at the railroad station, which was also the telegraph office, a figure stood for long in the deep shadow of the building. After a time, seeing no one, hearing no one, a man slipped an iron bar beneath a window sash, put his weight on it and heard the catch give with a snap and a tinkle. Slipping into the room he closed the window cautiously behind him.

He found Steve's message, signed with the single word, Jim; and after further searching, located the reply:

"God's in his heaven, all's well with the world. The option is grand news but indication of what you have done with Dad's trust brings the greatest happiness I have ever known. Twenty-five thousand currency will be delivered to Good-Bye Tuesday. Have team at Shoestring Monday noon.

"Kate."

And in the little camp beyond the Mad Woman two men lay under the arching stars and talked on and on.

"You've got it to do," LaFane said again and again. "You can do it; you must do it. In less than a week, now, you'll be as fit as you ever were. . . . And you can and you must; you can and you must!"

The boy beside him trembled a little.

CHAPTER VIII

Even after he had taken up the many details that were awaiting his decision Steve re-read that telegram from Kate Flynn and although one phase of her reaction gave him a feeling of vast achievement, another factor gave him pronounced dismay.

If LaFane failed to do for Young Jim what Steve had hoped he might do, Kate's heart would be broken. If he were making progress, Steve had no word of it and each day that was added to the absence of the two reduced his hope by just so much.

Drake knew that the time for his unmasking was at hand. Beyond a doubt Old Jim would send an attorney to close the timber deal and the chances were that any lawyer or agent so trusted would have had dealings with Polaris in the past, and would know Young Jim well.

When Steve re-entered his cabin on the return from town to find it in a sorry state of disarrangement he experienced a moment of great surprise. Then Franz's words at the Laird's came back. He had boasted that Steve had no evidence against him to prove that he had attempted murder.

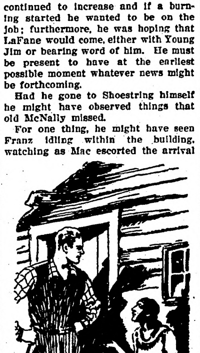
Sure enough; the shotgun was gone. He was chagrined at not having taken more precautions. However, he told himself, the threat which he had held over Franz was no longer of major importance. The man could tell his story of having discovered the genuine Young Jim elsewhere in the country almost any time, now; it would make little difference to any person but Kate.

Early on a Sunday morning McNally harnessed his light team and started for town to meet the arrival due the next day.

Drake would have driven to the railroad himself but the fire hazard continued to increase and if a burning started he wanted to be on the job; furthermore, he was hoping that LaFane would come, either with Young Jim or bearing word of him. He must be present to have at the earliest possible moment whatever news might be forthcoming.

Had he gone to Shoestring himself he might have observed things that old McNally missed.

For one thing, he might have seen Franz idling within the building, watching as Mac escorted the arrival toward the waiting wagon. He was even close enough to hear McNally say as he looked down at the brief case which was lifted in query:



"You Want Me?" She Asked So Simply and Directly That It Quite Took His Breath.

"Oh, that'll be all right! Jim'll likely take it right down to the Laird's. Anyhow, we got a good safe 'n th' store to lock it up in."

After the team trotted up into the town to have McNally's purchases loaded, Franz hailed an automobile, parleyed with the driver and was driven northward on the Good-Bye road. The car could take him only a dozen miles before the route entered swamp country that could be handily traveled only by teams, but it completed that much of the trip before McNally had more than a start on the way home. From there Franz went afoot, headed toward Good-Bye lake. He swam the lower river and, at night, rolled himself in a blanket taken from a pack-sack cached beneath a well-concealed canoe.

Until the arrival in the country of Steve Drake, Franz's first plan, which had taken many months in the fashioning, had progressed steadily. Once upon a time, he had sought to attach himself to Old Jim Flynn, render the services of which he was capable and profit therefrom, as most men profit. His impulse then had been rather decent; he was willing to give value for what he received.

Then Kate Flynn had come to Good-Bye with her father. In the beginning she appeared to like him but her intuition had it that the man was not what he appeared to be on the surface, that he was not one, even, for her father to depend on.

When this became clear to Franz, what decency had been in his character before was consumed by the fire of his greed and ruthlessness. Nothing remained for him in his relationship with the Flynns except gain.

But he did not betray himself in the beginning. He appeared to take his failure to win Kate's heart with as much grace as a man can. He pretended a continuing friendship with Polaris until his connections with rival timber owners were perfected. Then he had commenced his campaign to undermine Old Jim; had, by his land deals, drawn a strangling boundary of ownership around the outfit and, with so much accomplished, stepped into the open and sought to turn even the Flynn crew against the company.

Everything seemed to be going well. The arrival of the man for whom he was to form such an antipathy frustrated the success of that scheme. His hope of sending Jim Flynn tobogganing into ruin so his holdings might go to add to that growing empire of timberlands which Franz's principals desired was quickly cooled by the new signs of life about the job which followed the arrival of an outstanding leader.

This was bad enough but, added to these other failures which could be laid only at the feet of the one who posed as a Flynn, was the item of his hold over Mary Wolf. When Steve Drake aided the girl in her departure from the squalid little farm home where she had been so conveniently located, Franz was shaken by an urge for vengeance which knew no bounds.

He tried to kill, in a coward's way, and failed. He tried blackmail, a coward's weapon, and failed again. At MacDonald's, because of his regard for the old Scot's nature, he was forced to stand by and see the last plan he had laid for personal gain go crashing down.

But he was no quitter, this Franz! And when he read those telegrams, at Shoestring, hope came to life again. Money was coming into the country; money in a quantity which was in itself disturbing to consider. But that money meant more than the possession of so many thousands. It renewed his faith that some day he would be the agent for a transaction involving the transfer of the much coveted MacDonald property.

He had unmasked Steve Drake for the Laird at the proper moment. If that option could be caused to lapse he felt certain that the eccentric old Scot would refuse to renew a deal with one who had hoodwinked him or with a corporation which had had such a one in its service. So, the option must lapse.

Steve was in the store when McNally drove into the clearing. Mac had planned to spend the night at the last farmhouse between headquarters and town and Drake, after breakfast, had busied himself there to be present at the arrival.

But his mind was not wholly on that event, important though it was. It persisted in going back to an earlier incident of the day.

He had awakened as usual when the chorus of bird songs commenced to swell, dressed and stepped outside with an ejaculation of surprise, because Mary Wolf was seated on a log beside his threshold, elbows on knees, waiting with stolid patience, apparently for his appearance.

"Hullo, Mary! When and where'd you drop from?"

"Camp. Jus' now," she said.

"Something wrong? Has Franz been after you again? I haven't seen him in days and I'd wondered about you."

"Nothing wrong. Franz don't come by our camp."

"Well, if nothing's wrong . . . What brings you here again, Mary?"

"You want me?" she asked so simply and directly that it quite took his breath.

"Want you? Why . . . What . . . That is, I don't know what you're driving at," he evaded lamely.

The girl stirred slowly on the log.

"My father, he die bye-'n'-bye," she said. "Not long, now. He gets worse. He breathes fast . . . So." She panted. "I should not go before he is dead. He is old; sick. At school they tol' us we should stay by old people. Take care of 'em. That is right. I do.

"But he die pretty soon. I can go, Yo'ng Jim," she said, "you treat me good. You are the only yo'ng man who ever treats me good. You say to me, you do to me like your men say and do by white women. You are . . . you are . . ." She hesitated, seeming to search for the proper word. Then, successful, spoke it with as much emphasis, it is likely as she had ever placed on an utterance. "You are kind."

Steve laughed, deeply embarrassed.

"I say what is so: you are kind. You live alone. I can cook good. They tol' me at school I can cook good. I not like some. Some girls don' work. Me, I work. My father die. I come here and cook for you. I do it all. Sweep. Wash. Sew. I be your girl."

Red swept into Steve's cheeks. She searched his face with a probing gaze, almost as a faithful dog might, expecting largess.

"When Old Jim come, I go away. When white girls come, I go away. When you go to town, me I stay by camp. I think everything when I got bark and split cedar. What you say, Jim?"

Now, what did a man say to a proposal such as this?

Steve Drake said nothing at all. He had not a word at his command for that interval. In Mary's plan was nothing unclean, nothing offensive. It was childishly natural. He had been kind to her, probably the first man of his race and years whom she had known and who had not looked upon her as a creature of utility, and in her gratitude she was offering all that she possessed.

"Why, Mary," he began with a helpless feeling as he realized the futility of attempting to make her understand either how deeply her offer touched him or the impossibility of his acceptance. "You . . . I don't know what to say to make you know that I am your friend. But, even so, you can't come here and stay. Understand that? I can't have you here."

Simple Festivity That Will Delight Children

In various parties and games suggested, little attention has been paid to children's entertainment. So today we suggest a festivity for them. One game which all little folk will delight in is hunting for Babes in the Woods.

The hostess gets many tiny dolls, sometimes more than one can be bought for a nickel. They should be very small, for they must be hidden for the hunt. The number of dolls should be equal to the number at the party. She dresses the dolls by taking narrow strips of material or of crepe paper, and cutting a hole in the center of a doubled strip as long as the doll. The doll's head is thrust through the hole, and the material is drawn down and about the doll, whose arms come out between openings at sides. A narrow ribbon or heavy silk floss is tied about each doll's waist, and the costuming is complete.

Before the party begins the hostess hides these dressed dolls around the room, being sure no doll is out of reach of the children. When all the guests have arrived the hostess tells in graphic manner about the Babes in the Woods, winding up the story by saying that little dolls, as babes, are hidden about the room, and every child must hunt until she finds one. When she has rescued just one doll she is to stop hunting. When everyone succeeds in rescuing just one doll the game is over and everyone must sit down, and some food for the hungry dolls will be passed. The hostess has a plate of plain crackers ready and each child has one to eat for her dolly.

The hostess now brings out a large covered basket, and each child is invited, in turn, to put in her hand and help herself to one package. Each parcel contains a dressed paper doll, made by the hostess, or a paper-doll-set of a simple sort bought from some shop. The packages should be so wrapped and tied or secured by fancy seals that they can be opened without tearing doll or dress.

Dolls should be featured in the refreshments. Around a central cake an array of lollypops dressed as dolls stand as sentinels. The dresses of paper can be stiff enough to make the dolls stand erect. Eyes, nose and a mouth can be painted or pencilled on the lollypop wrapper, and a piece of tissue or crepe paper be fastened as a bonnet over the back of the head so fashioned. Crepe paper can be tied about the stick of the lollypop to make a frock, or the costuming can be more elaborate. Each child gets one of these dolls, which gives them the candy portion of the refreshments.

Gingerbread men, or other cooky dough, cut with the doll cooky cutter, are just the thing for the cake, apart from the central cake, if it is a birthday party. Sandwiches with hot, weak cocoa, and milk, for beverages, and ice cream with the cookies and cake form enough of a menu. But be sure to have sufficient to satisfy children's appetites, and enough variety in kinds of sandwiches to suit varying tastes.

Effects of War Gases

Most physicians believed at the close of the World war that the results of the gas attacks during the war would surely be the development of tuberculosis and bronchial troubles among the victims. Fifteen years have passed without the feared after effects.

A careful check by the War department and the Veterans bureau has revealed that very few of the tubercular and bronchial cases can be laid at the door of gas attacks. In most of these cases it is believed that the germs were already present and not caused by the gas. Medical officers believe that enough time has passed to show up any after effects caused by the gas experience.—Pathfinder Magazine.

A small girl will look very sweet in this little dress. The yoke is scalloped in front and plain in back. There are little bows which tie the sleeves very smartly, and a cunning collar. Her mother can make the dress, omitting the lower part of the sleeves and the collar, as the small sketch shows. Use the pattern to make several different dresses; for example, it's cute made of a cotton print, and equally dainty in one of the pastel shades in plain silk or linen, or dimity.

Pattern 9695 may be ordered only in sizes 2, 4, 6, 8, and 10. Size 4 requires 2⅛ yards 36-inch fabric and ⅜ yard contrasting.

Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Send your order to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 232 W. Eighteenth St., New York, N. Y.

The Dog a Native American

Man Probably Originated in Africa, but the Earliest Fossil Member of the Dog Family Has Been Found Here in North America.

From the Literary Digest.

The dog has frequently been called man's best friend. At least since the Azilian phase of the Old Stone age he has been devoted to humanity. This famous partnership was probably cemented in Europe, but the partners came from widely divergent regions of the earth. Man possibly originated in Africa. The dog is a native American.

The oldest fossil members of the dog family are found in the Lower Oligocene of western North America; they lived here about thirty-eight million years ago. In that time, says Prof. William K. Gregory, in the Bulletin of the New York Zoological society, the dog family was already represented by two genera, Cynodictis, the common ancestor of all the modern dogs, wolves, foxes, dholes, etc., as well as of the raccoon family, and Daphoenus, ancestor of the giant dogs and the bears.

Cynodictis was not yet either a dog, a wolf or a fox. It had somewhat of the long-bodied, slinking habit of the civet. Its feet were less compressed than in later dogs, the claws were slightly retractile. Its predecessors, fossils of which are found in Wyoming, were still less dog-like. They were tree-living animals, somewhat like raccoons, with spreading hands and feet. The fast-running dogs of later times were evolved as the plains replaced the forests in both western North America and Europe.

Daphoenus had a more massive skull than Cynodictis, with upper molars of the crushing type. Bears, in fact, are only gigantic short-tailed dogs that have learned to walk on the whole soles of their feet and in which the crushing molars have become greatly increased in size, says Professor Gregory. In the rocks laid down in late Tertiary time, before the onset of the great Ice age, are found fossil skeletons of a creature, Hyaenarctos, regarded by many authorities as the connecting link between dogs and bears.

From North America, dogs spread rapidly all over the world, probably reaching Asia over a land bridge at Behring strait and thence to Europe and Africa, and South America over the present land connection when it was established about twenty million years ago. At that time there were already many species—swift-running forms with narrow, compressed feet. These ancestral dogs in successive ages gave rise to the numerous types of modern wolves, dogs, foxes, and fox-like animals.

Among the most curious of modern dogs are those of South America, which resemble true dogs on one hand, and foxes on the other. Their lines of descent have been hard to trace, says Doctor Gregory, but it is now evident that they are really "living fossils"—surviving relics of the old dogs of the Miocene and Pliocene ages of western North America which crossed the land bridge to the southern continent.

Probably the strangest of these South American dogs is the bush dog, distinguished by his short muzzle and the loss of his second upper and lower molars, his short legs and other features which give him a most undoglike appearance.

Penalty of Greatness

It would be impossible to find a single great man in the world today who has not had some mud thrown at him.—Maxim Gorky.

"GRANDFATHER" OF RADIO

Thomas Edison, who has been called the father of electric light and the phonograph, may likewise be considered the father—or at least the grandfather—of modern radio, since in 1883 he made the progenitor of our modern radio tubes, and took out a patent that Marconi later purchased.

This was revealed at the national electrical exposition in New York, when members of the New York Electrical society used one of Edison's early lamps as detector tube in a radio set, and successfully received a regular broadcast program with it. The great inventor was aware of the electrical action of the tube.—Literary Digest.

Firestone
LEADERSHIP
"The Ultimate Test of Leadership is Performance"

FIRESTONE maintains its leadership in tire development by producing a new tire for 1934 with a wider tread, flatter contour, deeper non-skid, greater thickness, and more and tougher rubber, which gives greater non-skid safety, more traction, greater blowout protection, and more than 50% longer non-skid mileage.

These achievements are made practical by the Firestone patented process of Gum-Dipping, providing greater adhesion between the plies of the high stretch cords and between the Gum-Dipped body of the tire and the tough, massive non-skid tread. It also provides greater strength, longer flexing life, and greater protection against blowouts.

Gum-Dipping made it possible for Firestone to design, develop and put on the market the first successful balloon tire in 1923. This tire was the pattern used by all others and completely revolutionized the tire industry and set new standards for the automobile industry.

For fourteen years leading race drivers have driven to victory on Firestone tires, built with Gum-Dipped high stretch cords. They have trusted their lives to Firestone Leadership—as they know that the patented Firestone construction features provide them with greater safety—longer mileage—and greater blowout protection.

Have your Firestone Dealer or Service Store replace your smooth dangerous tires with the new Firestone High Speed Tires for 1934.

Bermuda Has No Snakes

The only country in the world which can truthfully assert that it has no snakes is Bermuda. They are unknown there. Bermudian children think of a snake as an extinct monster that lived in the Garden of Eden. If they were to be shown an American rattlesnake they would probably try to make a pet of it. But lacking as she is in snakes, Bermuda has an abundance of birds and flowers. More than 186 species of birds have been recorded in Bermuda.

Chicago Once Coral Reef

Chicago, known to the world as the windy city, was once a "South Sea paradise," but that was 400,000,000 years ago at least. This is the claim which is advanced by the Field Museum of Natural History in an article in its bulletin, which describes Chicago's site as once having been a coral reef, submerged under the waters of a great interior sea.

"Swan Song"

The term, "swan song," is familiar to all for a farewell performance, or the last creative effort of an artist. The allusion is to the song popularly believed to be sung by a swan when dying. The origin of the metaphor is found in the "Epigrams" of the famous Latin "Martial," probably Marcus Valerius Martialis, who is believed to have lived from the year 40 to 102 A. D. And a well-known use of it is in Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice."

Safetygrams by Fred W. Braun, The Safety Man

Let us consider the road hog. Have you ever seen him work? Just drive out on a highay anytime of the the day or night. Choose year own highway. You will find these road hogs a menace to safety anywhere. Territorial restrictions are not known by these critters.

Their technique is wonderful. They pull over into the center of the road and sit back with dangerous complacency owning the highway, are taxpayers in the state, and feel that they have right to drive wherever, whenever, and however they please. All the warnings and "honking" on your part does not seem to affect them.

What shall we do with them? An effective state police or sheriff force would soon curb this menace. We could drive them off the road by frequent arrests and fines. Enforcement is absolutely necessary.

Let us drive with caution so that we will not fall within this classification.

Deliver Your Cream Early During The Summer Months

We are now approaching the time of the year when warm weather is about to set in. This means that frequent deliveries of cream are more necessary. Early deliveries of cream will help a great deal at this time to keep up the quality of our butter.

Cream delivered in the morning has no chance to sour which otherwise may happen, causing a loss to both the patron and creamery. We ask your cooperation on this.

The Weather

The weather the past week has been of a variety order. Monday was a little warm before the rain. Tuesday and Wednesday were cool and cloudy. Yesterday it was real cold. The crops have made a grand spurt in growing since we got such nice moisture.

Some time ago we mentioned in our weather report that we needed warm weather and sure enough we got some. Then one farmer said we should ask for rain. We did that and, have had two rains since.

How about us getting a little compensation for this fixing we have done for you. You know that it pays to advertise and the weatherman must have read the News about these things that you wanted us to get you.

Rain Ends Hot Dry Spell And Checks Grasshopper Menace

We had another dandy rain here Monday evening. Later in the night it set into a fine drizzle which kept on till late Tuesday morning.

Reports given us on Tuesday by residents of Warren were that they too had a good shower It was reported that the northeastern part of the county got a real soaking.

The farmers as well as others are happy over the prospect of a fair crop since the dry spell broke.

Yesterday morning we had a quite steady rain for about three hours which added a great deal to the moisture supply.

The past three days have been cool and cloudy which weather condition has aided the rain in doing double duty and, also has killed millions of the little grasshoppers that were hatching.

Minnesota Granted Two Subsistence Homesteads

One of six states in the Union to receive such a grant, Minnesota was awarded two subsistence homestead projects, by the Federal government one to be located at Austin, the other near Duluth. It is planned that the members of the homestead groups will be employed on part time basis at industrial plants in the cities and will provide themselves with foodstuffs and agricultural products from their three to five-acre plots. The cost of a homestead will be approximately $2,000 to be paid off during a period of 20 years. This cost includes from three to five acres of land, 12 chickens, a cow, a pig, and a comfortable four or five room house. Construction will be started on the homes in the near future.

I favor:

Revision of our present tax laws based on a careful study of our tax system by a commission representative of all sections of the state.

Payment of School Aids in Full.

An organized method of debt reduction.

Control of contemplated public expenditures when they involve increasing the public debt.

The application of practical common sense to all legislation.

The Reason Why - -

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

Military Coup Sets Up Dictatorship for Bulgaria—Senator Reed's Victory Over Pinchot—Great Conflagration in Chicago Stock Yards.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

CONSTITUTIONAL government has been discarded by another European nation. In a bloodless coup d'etat the Bulgarian army took control of that country under a military dictatorship. King Boris either sponsored the movement or quietly yielded to it. He promptly signed about thirty decrees that were prepared in advance, dissolving the parliament and putting the new government in power, with Kimon Gueroguieff as premier. Members of the former government and several other persons were arrested. Not only in Sofia, the capital, but throughout the country the military leaders were in control of the situation and no disturbances were reported except from that part of Macedonia that now belongs to Bulgaria. For years the Macedonians have been demanding their independence, and they do not approve of the Fascist government set up by the army.

King Boris

The program of the new government was set forth in a long manifesto calling for the creation of a disciplined, orderly state. The principal alterations in the structure of the government include a sharply reduced membership in the legislature, which is to be under firm control of the administration, a reduction in number of the country's political subdivisions, a general weeding out of municipal and provincial authorities, and an intensification of attention upon the interests of villages and rural regions.

The new premier is a veteran soldier and politician whose mild appearance belies his firmness and activity.

Behind Gueorguieff—some even call him the man behind the whole coup d'etat—is Damyan Velcheff, former head of the Bulgarian military academy.

Boris, the forty-year-old king, may be relegated to a position of comparative unimportance, as was the king of Italy by Mussolini and his Fascists. But Boris is known as a good fighter and perhaps he can keep himself at the head of his people in fact as well as in name.

WHILE the Paraguayans and the Bolivians were engaged in the biggest and most important battle in the Chaco war, with between 60,000 and 80,000 men on both sides, the League of Nations council at Geneva sent cables to 31 governments asking if they would put an arms embargo on the two nations. This action was taken after the council had adopted a resolution favoring such an embargo at the earliest possible moment, in accord with the message given the congress and the world by President Roosevelt. The State department in Washington was pursuing conversations with Peru, Chile, Brazil and Argentina in the effort to bring an end to the bloody fighting in the Gran Chaco. Bolivian Minister Finot objected strongly to the proposed embargo, asserting it would impose an injustice on Bolivia because Paraguay has an arms and munitions factory and Bolivia has none.

Good news came from Rio de Janeiro, where representatives of Peru and Colombia reached a peaceful settlement of the differences between their nations over the jungle border village of Leticia and thus dissipated a war cloud which has hung over South America for twenty months.

SENATOR DAVID A. REED of Pennsylvania, fighting in the Republican primaries for renomination, emerged from the hectic battle victorious over his rival, Gov. Gifford Pinchot. Reed's majority was in the neighborhood of 100,000, and long before all the returns were in Governor Pinchot gave up and wired his congratulations to the senator.

Senator Reed

Since Senator Reed, one of the Old Guard conservatives, has been an unrelenting critic of the New Deal, and Governor Pinchot, a "progressive" Republican, has given his full support to President Roosevelt's policies, the result of the primaries was hailed with glee by opponents of the national administration. Both the candidates made the New Deal the issue in their campaign, and when the governor was prevented by illness from making speeches, Mrs. Pinchot took the stump and vigorously defended the President's programs of recovery. Notwithstanding all this, Postmaster Farley said: "I do not regard the defeat of Governor Pinchot as a New Deal test," and Senator Joseph T. Robinson, Democratic leader, took the same attitude.

Senator Daniel O. Hastings of Delaware, chairman of the Republican congressional campaign committee, issued a pronouncement that the Pennsylvania primary result was "a great victory for the American citizen who wants a square deal and not a New Deal."

Governor Pinchot, who has tried twice before to get into the senate, said he would continue to fight for the interests of the people against concentrated wealth, and it was reported that he would run independently in November.

Joe Guffey, Democratic leader in Pennsylvania, easily won his party's nomination for the senate, but the Republicans claim he will have small chance against Reed in the election.

CLARENCE DARROW'S report on the NRA, submitted some time ago to President Roosevelt, has been made public, and in the main it was just what was expected from the Chicago lawyer and his colleagues. It analyzed eight of the more important codes and found that seven of them foster monopolies, help big business and do a lot toward putting small concerns out of business. These seven codes are: Electrical manufacturing, footwear division, rubber manufacturing, motion pictures, retail solid fuel, steel, ice, and bituminous coal. The report found no monopolistic features in the cleaners and dyers' code.

Administrator Johnson and his chief counsel, Donald R. Richberg, had been given the report previously for the purpose of composing a reply to it. This they did, to the extent of 50,000 vigorous words. They answered all the Darrow charges and asserted the report was "superficial," "intemperate," "inaccurate," "prejudiced," "one sided," "inconsistent," "nonsensical," "insupportable," "false," and "anarchistic."

IN ITS battle with the NRA the Ford company won first blood, obtaining from Justice J. W. Cox of the District of Columbia Supreme court temporary injunctions enjoining Secretary of the Interior Ickes and Secretary of Agriculture Wallace from rejecting bids of the Northwest Motor company for supplying Ford trucks to their departments.

The orders were based on the Ford agency's complaints that the secretaries had refused its bids, which were acknowledged to be lower than those of competitors, on the ground that no certificate had been filed by the Ford Motor company showing that it was complying with the NRA code.

PAT HURLEY, former secretary of war, appeared before the senate civil service committee in a warlike mood and angrily demanded that there be a full examination of charges that he was party to a patronage plot hatched by Republicans at his home in Virginia. He declared that it should be determined whether the Department of Justice is out to smear all members of the preceding administration or whether A. V. Dalrymple, the special assistant attorney general who made the charges, is "just an irresponsible falsifier in charge of the wooden pistol section of the Department of Justice."

Patrick J. Hurley

Mr. Hurley bitterly criticized the department for permitting one of its officials, Webster Spates, to read to the committee an anonymous, hitherto confidential report entitled "the New Deal with the same old dealers." The report declared "the same old gang of standpat Republicans are gatekeepers to the patronage pastures."

Mr. Dalrymple read to the committee letters from C. W. Broom and Lee Shannon, who told the Justice department assistant that persons whom they declined to name had informed them of the meeting at Hurley's home, where prominent Republicans were alleged to have planned how they could hold on to patronage jobs despite the change in administration. Dalrymple denied that he had made the charges himself.

APPROXIMATELY $8,000,000 damage was done by a conflagration in Chicago that was described as the worst that city had experienced since the great fire of 1871. It started in the Union Stock Yards, familiar to all visitors to the city, and within a few hours had swept over an area equivalent to about eight city blocks. The flames also leaped across Halsted street, destroying many shops and residences. Happily only one human life was lost, though the injured, mostly firemen, numbered some 1,100. As the stock pens were comparatively empty over the week-end, the loss of live stock was restricted. All the horses were driven out to safety.

Among the buildings destroyed were the International Amphitheater, scene of the live stock and horse shows; the famous Saddle and Sirloin club and the Stock Yards inn; two national banks, and the new and old Exchange buildings occupied by many commission firms. The task of rebuilding was started at once, and it was announced that the destroyed structures would be replaced by fireproof buildings.

CONGRESS held a joint session to observe the one hundredth anniversary of the death of General Lafayette, and President Roosevelt was in attendance, carrying a sword presented to him recently by Count Renee de Chadbrun, direct descendant of the famous French marquis. After the session the President placed the sword beneath a portrait of Washington in the White House while legislators, diplomats, Supreme court justices and cabinet members looked on. Andre de Laboulaye, French ambassador, spoke.

DR. GEORGE F. ZOOK has resigned as United States commissioner of education, effective July 1, and President Roosevelt has designated John Ward Studebaker of Des Moines, Iowa, to succeed him. Doctor Zook, who formerly was president of the University of Akron, will become director of the American Council of Education in the fall.

FOR more than thirty years the radical La Folletteites of Wisconsin have been operating as Republicans and under that label have competed, often with success, for control of the state. Now this is to be changed. With the aid of delegates from labor and farm organizations, the followers of Senator La Follette, assembled in convention in Fond du Lac, formed a new party and named it the Progressive party. No statement of principles was made, all attempts to bring one forth being squelched.

Senator La Follette

Senator La Follette kept in the background until questions of organization were settled. With the party name decided, the senator came into the picture with a prepared speech.

The period called Republican prosperity, he said, had culminated in the collapse of the country's economic life. "The disaster of 1929 and the acute distress and suffering of the American people that followed were made possible by the betrayal of the people's trust by men in both parties, controlled through their party organizations by privileged interests."

John J. Handley, secretary of the Wisconsin Federation of Labor, told the delegates he was disappointed in the character of the conference. Speaking deliberately and carefully for organized labor he said he had hoped and expected the conference was to bring together all of the forces of liberal thought. If it does not, he said organized labor will not go along.

A few hours later a state central committee was formed, with former Gov. Philip La Follette as its chairman, and in Milwaukee it began mapping out the campaign for the autumn congressional and state elections.

IN ORDER that congress may adjourn June 5, or at the latest by the middle of the month, the President and several congressional leaders got together and pared down the legislative program. They agreed to limit the "must" bills to four measures. These are:

The one billion three hundred million-dollar emergency appropriation bill carrying funds for the continuation of the New Deal relief activities.

The communications control bill proposing the consolidation of federal regulation over all communications.

The loans to industries bill, authorizing RFC and federal reserve bank advances to smaller industries on intermediate credit terms.

The deposit insurance extension bill, continuing the temporary federal bank deposit guarantee plan for another year in lieu of putting the permanent program contained in the Glass banking bill into effect at this time.

One other measure that may be put through at this session is the silver bill upon which the President and the silver bloc agreed and which was to be introduced with a message from Mr. Roosevelt. As predicted, this is a compromise containing these provisions:

A declaration of policy that the government recognizes silver as primary money and that the nation's metallic reserves shall be 25 per cent silver and 75 per cent gold. This is mandatory.

The secretary of the treasury is authorized and directed to purchase silver until it reaches $1.29 an ounce or until its metallic reserve strength reaches 25 per cent. This is both permissive and mandatory.

The President is authorized to nationalize silver through condemnation. This is permissive.

CONSIDERATION of the records of three Chicago federal judges in receivership and bankruptcy cases were under consideration by the house judiciary committee, with the possibility of impeachment in prospect. A subcommittee turned in a report on the jurists, Charles E. Woodward, James H. Wilkerson and Walter C. Lindley, making no recommendations for or against impeachment but criticizing sharply their allowances for attorney and receiver fees.

With respect to Judge John P. Barnes, who has handled several receiverships and bankruptcies in the federal courts at Chicago since 1933, the subcommittee declared it had "no criticism as to his conduct in these matters."

SECRETARY OF THE NAVY SWANSON announced that as soon as funds can be obtained from the public works appropriation asked by the President, the construction of twenty warships will begin. These vessels will cost $40,000,000.

St. Paul—While Minnesota faces a real shortage of hay and the condition of pasturage is only 44 per cent of normal, the Minnesota crop reporting service reported that general crop conditions, while not so very promising, are not quite as bad as would be expected after the dust storms and lack of rains.

Minneapolis — Congressman Shoemaker in municipal court was found guilty of disorderly conduct in connection with strike disorders in the city market area. Judge Fred B. Wright imposed a fine of $50, or 10 days in the workhouse. Because the congressman is a candidate for senatorial nomination, the court stayed sentence to July 2.

St. Paul—A state-wide campaign to reduce accidents and fatalities was launched by the city and county officials and representatives of civic clubs from throughout the state meeting at the state capitol. Aamodt, assistant state entomologist, after a survey in St. Louis, Carlton and Pine counties, where he attended a series of 30 meetings, said the lack of rain created a serious situation.

St. Paul—Marion Evelyn Frechette, halfbreed Indian sweetheart of John Dillinger, and Dr. Clayton E. May, Minneapolis physician, were found guilty by a federal court jury of harboring the Indiana fugitive. Mrs. Augusta Salt, Minneapolis nurse, in whose apartment Dillinger was treated for a leg wound, was found not guilty. Miss Frechette, who had expressed hopes of marrying the outlaw, lost her iron nerve as Judge Gunnar H. Nordbye called her and Dr. May before him and sentenced them to two years in prison and $1,000 fine for each.

Smart Politics

Washington.—President Roosevelt's determination to advise congress as it leaves for home after the current session, of some of the things that he wishes to present for its consideration next January has injected a new factor into the forthcoming political campaigns. Most of the careful observers here think his maneuver was politically smart. They take the view that he actually has presented to the country and the voters the general outline of his future legislative program in order that he can have something of a mandate given the representatives and senators who are chosen in this fall's elections.

I haven't seen any signs yet that will indicate how the Republicans and other anti-Roosevelt forces will attempt to meet this new factor, but it is quite apparent they will force debate upon many of the projects of the New Deal that have already been enacted into law, as well as the embryo plans contained in his late messages. Some leading thinkers around Washington have suggested that Mr. Roosevelt is taking advantage of the natural attacks that will be promoted by the opposition in order to ascertain for himself whether he has gone far enough with his social reform movements. It seems there can be no doubt that he will be in a position to know the temper of the country after the voters have heard his various New Deal items discussed. And, it is being suggested almost in the same breath that if the voters strike down many of the administration wheelhorses and those who have stood by the New Deal, the administration will not press some of the more far-reaching social legislation that Mr. Roosevelt mentioned in the series of messages lately sent to congress.

Examining the proposals, such as old age pensions, unemployment insurance, revision of NRA principles relating to minimum wages to meet practical instead of theoretical conditions and several others, one can hardly escape the conclusion that only the submission of them at this time when they will become fodder for campaign debate will enable the country to know its own mind. In other words, as I see the picture, if the country as a whole wants such far-reaching changes in its laws, it will show it by sending proponents of such proposals to seats in congress.

I have heard some discussion, however, to the effect that in taking the bold step of giving congress advance information of his thoughts, Mr. Roosevelt was seeking at the same time to present a more complete picture of his New Deal. By so doing, of course, he naturally can expect that proponents of the reform ideas will have something more to use in advocating retention of the changes. They will not be in the dark as to what the future holds. Many of them will have added confidence, especially if they have become a bit shaky about the course that the President is following. At any rate, if the Democrats emerge from the fall elections with anything like their present strength, the congress that meets in January, 1935, will be as tractable, or more so, than the present one. Anyone can see the President would be unable to put over his New Deal without an obedient congress, hence he is staking that need, too, by disclosing plans in advance.

Trouble Brewing

It is not too much to say that there has been a tremendous stiffening of backbone in congress in the last several weeks. It has been more pronounced, I believe, than at any time since Mr. Roosevelt took over the reins. So there might possibly be some trouble brewing on Capitol Hill. This condition is regarded by some as being the more clearly discernible because the President frankly said he did not urge enactment of his proposals at this session.

There has been no secret about the fact, around here, that Mr. Roosevelt wanted to get congress out of town at the earliest possible date. I have heard it suggested even that he had hoped he could get the leaders to bring about an adjournment before the silver question got out of hand. But that desire was lost, if he entertained such hope. He has had to swallow some silver legislation which, it is quite apparent, he does not like. Political expediency made it necessary.

No one here has been able to explain just why the silverites have been able to muster so much strength. There are only seven silver states, and from the political standpoint, it is to be assumed that they cannot wield the power that is inherent in legislation affecting the more populous areas. But the silver bloc has persisted in its efforts, has been recalcitrant in many ways, and it never was licked completely. As far as I am concerned, I cannot see where it is going to be of any particular help. But the silver advocates tell me I am wrong, and, whatever else may be said, their views forced Mr. Roosevelt into a corner where he had to take a small dose of silver medicine.

It was easy to see a week or so ago that if the President had been able to stall off the silverites a little longer, he would have succeeded in getting an adjournment before he was compelled to agree that the country's money should be backed by 25 per cent of silver coin or bullion. Financial sharps assure me that actually the legislation on silver will do nothing more than raise the price temporarily to those who have silver to sell.

Borah's Outbreak

Senator Borah's recent outbreak on the President's proposal for authority to negotiate reciprocal tariff agreements with foreign nations is typical of the dangers confronting the administration in a session where adjournment is too long delayed. Senator Borah, though a Republican and a member of the minority in congress, has a strong following in congress and throughout the country. When he arises in his place, therefore, and challenges the administration, urges the country to return to constitutional government and says there is "a niche alongside of Washington and Lincoln" for a brave leader to preserve a free government — when Senator Borah makes that challenge, a good many persons are going to ask, whither are we going? The Borah speech was such a ringing call for clear thinking that I believe his concluding paragraphs are worthy of recording for further dissemination:

"We have had emergencies before, have had more than one hour of peril. The Constitution has been sufficient and efficient in all instances. And now, of all times, we should show our faith in, and our devotion to, our form of government. Now, more than at any other time in our history, we should by word and act demonstrate the faith which made this Republic, and which will preserve it.

"In the midst of world turmoil, Washington pinned his faith to Constitutional democracy. That steadfast soul never wavered, never doubted. In the midst of civil war, Lincoln declared that the government of the people, for the people, and by the people should not perish from the earth. There is a niche alongside of these two immortal defenders of free government for the brave American who in his place of power accepts the challenge of these apostles of terror and fanaticism, of these enemies, avowed enemies of free government and of personal liberty, and against all comers declares his faith in the efficiency and the worth of the republican institutions and his determination to maintain and preserve them in all of their integrity at any cost and at all hazards."

It is to be noted that Senator Borah made no reference to any individual now entrusted with power. His challenge was to the New Deal in its entirety, according to the opinions that I have heard expressed. From many directions, I have heard views that the Borah speech probably would arouse more fright among opponents of the New Deal than anything that yet has happened.

"Ding" Hits Snag

The inability of some government officials to carry out assignments given them by President Roosevelt, as a result of overlapping of authority or assumption of power by others under the complexities of the present governmental setup, has begun to attract attention. There are numerous instances that can be cited, but lately I encountered one that appears to me to be typical.

Mr. Roosevelt brought J. N. Darling, who is probably one of the greatest cartoonists of our day, to Washington as chief of the biological survey. Mr. Darling, whose signature "Ding" is known far and wide, is a zealot in his desire to restore game birds and animals to the numbers of earlier years.

The biological survey is a unit of the Department of Agriculture. Funds with which Mr. Darling was to acquire waste land, timber, swamps and swail, were to come from the vast appropriation managed by Secretary Ickes of the Department of the Interior. There was to have been $25,000,000, and Mr. Darling said when he came to Washington that he believed a splendid job could be done with that sum. He proceeded upon recommendations of a Presidential commission to make plans for acquisition of the necessary lands and was moving at a steady pace when, lo! he learned that Mr. Ickes had declined to make the funds available as planned.

Numerous conferences followed. Secretary Wallace, of the Department of Agriculture, and Mr. Darling were said to have figuratively wept on each other's shoulder. They tried to find some way to get the money transferred so that the work could go on and, I understand, did get $1,500,000 made available from somewhere in the various alphabetical organizations.

In the meantime, I am told, Secretary Ickes was determined to have his own inspection made of lands proposed to be acquired, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Roosevelt had named a commission for the specific purpose of locating the sites, etc. Also, in the meantime, it has been disclosed that the original $25,000,000 has been "earmarked" for several other propositions.

STRONGER BUSINESS AND STRONGER BANKS

By F. M. LAW
President American Bankers Association

DURING the crisis when confidence was shattered, bankers were properly concerned in liquidity. Their main thought was to prepare to meet any demand for withdrawal of funds. They were more interested therefore in collecting loans than in making them. For this they cannot be justly blamed. It was a proper procedure. Now that confidence has been so largely restored banks will naturally resume a more normal lending policy. This does not mean they will or should extend loose or unsound credit, but that in the utmost good faith bankers will perform their proper part in recovery by a sympathetic and constructive attitude in the making of sound loans. Nor should commercial banks make capital or long time loans, for the reason that their loans are made from funds derived from deposits payable for the most part on demand.

F. M. LAW

When the return of confidence is further on its way, business men will find need for credit in making their plans. Then good borrowers, who for the most part have been so conspicuously absent from the market, will return. They will be warmly welcomed by the banks.

Business Men's Fears

Business men have not yet laid all their fears. They worry about what Congress may or may not do. They concern themselves about a trend toward control of business by government. They fear taxes beyond their power to pay. These are real sources of worry and when they are reassured along these lines they will be more inclined to take a fresh look at the future and to make plans to go forward.

As a matter of fact there are tangible evidences of recovery. The Federal Reserve Board officially has stated that prices, wages, business activity and production were back to the highest peak since early in 1931. Commercial failures in the United States are being cut almost in half as compared with the same period last year. It has been reported that the decline in export and import trade was definitely checked in the middle of 1933 and replaced during the last half of the year by a substantial recovery movement.

Among favorable factors is the improved condition of the banks. It is doubtless true that the banking structure of the country has never been in a sounder, stronger and more liquid condition than it is today. My authority for that statement is the Comptroller of the Currency. No longer is there any fear or thought of bank runs. Depositors once more know that their money is safe and the banker, thrice armed in the knowledge of his own strength, is looking forward.

Training for Bankers

The American Bankers Association has been active for many years training young men and women in order that they may be duly qualified for the business of banking. Standard courses are furnished with able and experienced teachers. This work is done under the direction of the American Institute of Banking Section of the association. Over two hundred chapters, or local banking schools, are in active operation throughout the country and thousands of the younger generation of bankers are being graduated each year. These students are taught not only banking practices and policies, but they are also well grounded in the highest ideals and standards of business ethics. A proposal is now under consideration to establish a central school, which will offer advanced or graduate work to a selective list taken from those who have completed the standard courses.—F. M. Law, President American Bankers Association.

Banks Repaying Loans From R. F. C.

Although banks and trust companies have been the largest borrowers from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, they have exceeded all other classes of borrowers in the rapidity of their repayments. Since the inception of the R. F. C. in February, 1932, loans have been authorized by it to 7,080 banking-institutions in the amount of $1,995,000,000. Of this sum $442,000,000 was not taken by the borrowers, the actual advances being $1,553,000,000.

Repayments against these advances through April 30, 1934, aggregated $925,000,000, or about 60 per cent. The ratio of repayments for all classes of borrowers has been only about 37 per cent. These rapid repayments by the banks are taken by competent observers as a strong indication of returning normal financial and banking conditions.

Bankers Finance Scholarships

The American Bankers Association Foundation for Education in Economics has since its establishment in 1928, awarded 354 college loan scholarships, the total loans repaid in that period being $262,000 and the amount now outstanding $86,900. The total investments of its funds are $540,000.

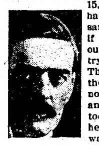
More Squirming to Avoid Payment of War Debts to America—Repeal and Beer Worry Members of Congress Assembling for Session.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

GREAT BRITAIN was still hopeful that the United States would not insist that the $95,550,000 war debt principal and interest, due December 15, must be paid. She had the money necessary, and would pay if there was no way out of it, but kept on trying to find a way. The cabinet approved the terms of a new note to Washington and even King George took a hand and helped decide what was best to be done. The king had a long interview with Neville Chamberlain, chancellor of the exchequer, who laid before him the proposal of the treasury which is dominated by Montagu Norman, head of the Bank of England. This presumably was that Britain should refuse to pay now or, at least, should pay into a 'blocked account, not transferring any money to America at this time.



Neville Chamberlain

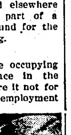
Opposed to this view was that of the foreign office, upheld by Prime Minister MacDonald, that payment should be made promptly if the new request for postponement were refused, and that the entire matter of international debts be taken up with the Roosevelt administration when it comes into power. It was indicated that the foreign office had won out in the controversy.

France, the most determined of the opponents of payment, was passing the buck to England, Premier Herriot's government seeking to hold off decision and even parliamentary discussion until the British course was announced. Many of the deputies, however, were rebellious and sought to force the government to a showdown.

DIRECTLY connected with the war debt affair was the fall of the pound sterling, long the unit of international finance, to unprecedentedly low prices. By the middle of the week the European gold standard exchanges also weakened considerably, and at the same time the Japanese yen and Chinese currencies broke badly.

From London came reports that there had developed a sudden scarcity of available dollars in the world markets that Britain may purchase to pay the United States. The evidence was that American currency had been bought up in France and elsewhere by exchange brokers as part of a scheme to depress the pound for the benefit of bears on sterling.

BEER would seem to be occupying too prominent a place in the American public mind, were it not for the national income and employment relief features involved in the restoration of the beverage to a legalized status. Early in the week Speaker Garner devised a plan to put the hesitant legislators on the spot. The drys and semi-drys had been asserting that a measure legalizing beer and possibly light wines should not be pressed to passage until a resolution for repeal of the Eighteenth amendment had been put through. So Mr. Garner drew up such a resolution and announced that he would insist on its being put to a vote in the house on Monday, the first day of the short session. It was a resolution for flat repeal, with no mention of protection for the dry states.



Speaker Garner

Many congressmen, both Democrats and Republicans, called on the speaker with protests and pleas for delay, and Mr. Garner began to weaken, saying that if he found there was considerable objection to consideration of his resolution he would just as soon back up and say: "We will wait." Fred Britten of Chicago and other eminent wets tried to keep the speaker to his determination, Britten assuring him that the Republican side of the house would supply more than 100 votes for the repeal resolution. But there was no certainty of more than 130 Democratic votes, so it was doubtful whether the necessary two-thirds majority could be obtained. Later in the week some of the dry members from the South were reported to be sliding over to the repeal side and the prospects of the resolution were considered brighter.

REPRESENTATIVE CARL VINSON of Georgia, chairman of the house committee on naval affairs, had a long talk with President-Elect Roosevelt at Warm Springs, and came away with his former "big navy" attitude considerably changed. He did not quote Mr. Roosevelt, but announced that he would favor drastic cuts in the naval building program and general economies. He declared at least $100,000,000 could be pared from the naval budget and said he was now willing that the building program should be reduced to a point far below the maximum set by the treaty of London.

From what Mr. Vinson said it was apparent that Mr. Roosevelt hopes to provide the United States with a small but powerfully effective navy. He thinks, too, that economies can be effected by the consolidation of some bureaus and a better control of all purchases.

PRESIDENT-ELECT ROOSEVELT held a series of conferences on farm relief with farm organization leaders and legislators, including Senators Robinson, Wheeler and Bankhead, and Henry Morgenthau, and the net result seemed to be a probability that nothing would be done during the short session except the enactment of some emergency measures such as price fixing and perhaps mortgage refinancing. Mr. Roosevelt declined to announce his own plan in advance, saying "That would be too much like telling congress what to do."

Farm leaders in Washington said they thought Mr. Roosevelt wants to meet the 1933 crop emergency and that they are willing to accept temporary measures such as the price-fixing bill that was proposed in the previous session.

HENRY FORD spent the week in the Detroit hospital that bears his name, recovering from an operation for strangulated hernia. The operation, which included removal of the appendix, was pronounced a success, and within three days the automobile manufacturer's temperature, pulse and respiration were back about to normal. By that time the hospital physicians and members of the Ford organization felt assured that the multi-millionaire's recovery was a matter only of rest and quiet. Members of his immediate family, who visited him daily, were no longer anxious about his condition. By the time this is read he may have been permitted to leave the hospital for his home.

DEATH took another congressman, this time the victim being James C. McLaughlin, Republican representative from the Ninth Michigan district and dean of that state's delegation. Stricken with heart disease while on a tour of Virginia, he died at Marion. Mr. McLaughlin, who was a member of the ways and means committee, was defeated in the recent elections by Harry W. Musselwhite, Democrat. His death makes the party lineup in the house at the "lame duck" session 208 Republicans, 220 Democrats, one Farmer-Labor, and six vacancies.

EXPANSION of its regulatory authority over public utility companies is recommended to congress by the power commission in its annual report. The body urges that it be authorized to require concerns with federal licenses, including holding companies to submit any information desired as an aid to their supervision. The two fundamental purposes in view, the commission said are:

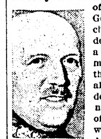
"First: Regulation of the holding company in relation to the operating company and through the operating company to the consumer of electrical energy; and, second, regulation of the holding company in relation to the investing public, which is principally interested in the securities of such holding company."

JUST as soon as there is a let up in the depression and federal finances permit, the regular army should be increased by 2,000 officers and 40,000 enlisted men, in the opinion of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, chief of staff. In his annual report the general said the army already has been reduced below the level of national safety.

"The regular army should be ready at all times," General MacArthur said, "to furnish any troops required by internal emergencies and initial defense against attack. The national defense act provided 18,000 officers and 280,000 men. This has been progressively reduced to 12,000 officers and 125,000 enlisted men, including Philippine scouts. On June 30, 1932, the actual figures were 12,180 officers and 119,888 enlisted men."

DONAL BUCKLEY, a retired shopkeeper who was a rebel against British rule for years, was appointed by King George to be governor general of the Irish Free State, on the advice of President De Valera, whose close friend he is. London was rather shocked by the appointment, many regarding it as a distinct attempt to belittle the king and bring the office of governor general into disrepute. Buckley succeeds James McNeill, who was forced out of office by De Valera.

THROUGHOUT another week President Paul von Hindenburg sought to find a man who could form a new ministry for Germany. His best bet of the seven days was Gen. Kurt von Schleicher, the minister of defense, who is probably the strongest man in public life in the reich. The general was willing to undertake the task, but needed the support of the Nazis, and this was denied him by Adolf Hitler who continued to hold the ground that there should be no government unless headed by himself. However, there was hope that Hitler would yield in later conferences. If not, there was a chance that the President might instruct Von Schleicher to form a cabinet and dissolve the reichstag. Or else, he might create a "business cabinet" under Von Papen and let it carry on, regardless of public opinion.



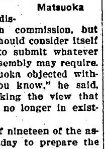
Gen. Von Schleicher

The Nazis said if the government dissolved the reichstag forcibly, this would be considered by them an illegal act and would evoke an "illegal answer."

PRESIDENT MACHADO of Cuba is not afraid of his political foes, who have so often sought his life; and he is determined to restore internal peace if possible. He ordered Gen. Alberto Herrera, chief of staff, to release 80 political prisoners, and the following day he directed that 66 other oppositionists be let out of the penitentiary on the Isle of Pines. Military rule was discontinued throughout the island except in Havana.

Machado's enemies said his magnanimity was due to unofficial pressure from the United States, but he denied this flatly.

EAMON DE VALERA, president of the League of Nations council, passed the Lytton commission report on Manchuria on to the league assembly, calling that body to convene in special session on December 6. The Japanese special representative, Yosuke Matsuoka made the usual reservation to this action in line with the Tokyo contention that the assembly is not competent to handle the Sino-Japanese affair, including the status of Manchuria.



Yosuke Matsuoka

The council dismissed the Lytton commission, but stipulated that it should consider itself subject to recall to submit whatever information the assembly may require. To this also Matsuoka objected without avail. "As you know," he said, "we have been taking the view that the commission is no longer in existence."

The committee of nineteen of the assembly met Thursday to prepare the program for the special session. Then some of the great powers will have to make clear their attitudes toward the far eastern situation and if the smooth-spoken Matsuoka cannot prevail it may be Japan will withdraw entirely from the league. Certainly she shows no intention of letting go her hold on Manchuria, whatever the rest of the world may do.

PREMIER HERRIOT of France and Ambassador Dovgalevsky of Russia signed in Paris the new Franco-Russian treaty of nonaggression and conciliation. It is the first such pact that the Soviet government has completed with any of the great powers.

AGRICULTURAL depression did not seem to hurt the International Live Stock show in Chicago, for this year the affair was bigger and better than ever. The title of grand champion steer of the world was awarded to a Hereford from Texas, the selection being made as usual by Judge Walter Biggar of Scotland. The animal was raised and exhibited by Will Largent of Merkel, Texas, and after its brief reign it went through the customary process of sale by auction, slaughter and consumption by Chicago gourmets.

Herman Trelle of Wembley, Alberta, Can., won the crown of world wheat king for the third successive year, the judges pronouncing his wheat the finest they had ever seen. The new hay king is M. V. Gillett of Nebraska.

Coincident with the stock show was the congress of 4-H clubs, attended by many hundreds of young agriculturists of both sexes who competed for the usual fine prizes.

HEARTILY backing up the demands of President William Green, the American Federation of Labor in convention in Cincinnati adopted a resolution calling for the universal adoption in industry of the five day week and the six hour day.

Stirring the delegates to waves of applause Mr. Green said labor's patience with industrial management was at an end. Labor's paramount policy, he said, henceforth would be to resort to "forceful methods," if necessary, to establish the shorter work week. By those methods he meant use of every weapon in the union armory—economic, political, and industrial.

It was indicated by Mr. Green that the spearhead in the movement for the thirty hour week would be a demand on the federal government that it set an example by establishing that reform.

THE CHRISTMAS DINNER

WHO among us can affect to despise the gastronomic delights of the family Christmas dinner? The most sophisticated person must admit our festive board at Christmas is a place where the gods might love to linger. What a picture it presents to the eye. The big turkey browned to a golden crispness; the heaping dish of mashed potatoes, which need only the addition of the delicious gravy to convert them into manna, and the dressing, seasoned to just the right proportions. Then there is the crisp pleasing salad, the golden sweet potatoes, the big dish of creamed cauliflower; the celery, olives, pickles and cranberry sauce; the mince and pumpkin pies, the rich, fragrant coffee, and the raisins, nuts and other goodies that follow. Kings and emperors in the past have conferred high honors on those who set some especially wonderful meal before them, but no king nor emperor of any age ever sat down to a dinner that looks and tastes as good as that which is set on the tables of the great American home on Christmas day.—Katherine Edelman.

Origin of the Christmas Tree

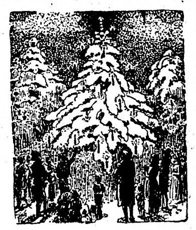
by Florence Studebaker

THE origin of the Christmas tree is much disputed and there are many popular legends concerning it. One popular tale pictures Martin Luther as attempting to describe the beauty of the snow-covered forest under the wintry sky. Suddenly the idea suggested itself. He hurried to the garden, cut a little fir tree, dragged it into the nursery, put some candles on its branches and lighted them. This was supposed to have happened on Christmas eve and the tale seeks to explain the origin of both tree and candles. One of the most popular German engravings represents Luther and his family grouped about the tree.

Another older German legend says St. Winifred is the originator of the idea. One day while surrounded by crowds of converts, the Saint was having a giant oak sawed down for use in Druidic worship. Suddenly a great wind rushed past the tree and sent it crashing backward where it destroyed everything in the path except a small fir tree. Because of the seeming miracle, St. Winifred decreed the fir tree be known as the Holy Tree, the tree of the Christ Child.

Still another authority declares the tree comes from the ancient Egyptian custom of decking houses at the time of the winter solstice with branches of the date palm—the symbol of life triumphant over death and an emblem of the starlit firmament. At the same time the Egyptians were decking houses with date palm branches, the Jews were celebrating the Feast of Chanuckah, in which lighted candles were a feature. A Greek festival at about this time is called "The Feast of Lights" and the Chinese festival of a corresponding period is called "The Feast of Lanterns." During the old Roman festival, pine trees were decorated with images of Bacchus, and the Christmas tree is believed by some to be a relic of this old custom.

The French have an interesting legend. In the Thirteenth century a huge tree was found, the branches were covered with candles, some of which stood erect and some upside down. On the top appeared a vision of a child with a halo around its head. When asked to explain this extraordinary tree, the pope exclaimed: "The tree represents mankind, the child is Christ and the candles are meant to indicate the good and bad human beings." Thereafter, according to this myth, the Christmas tree was used at Christmas time to bring happiness and good cheer.



"The Tree Represents Mankind," It Was Explained.

Now with all these vague traditions blended together we have as a final result the permanent establishment of the Christmas tree. Germany first decorated the tree with gifts. Not until the time of the marriage of Queen Victoria did the tree become a regular English institution. When the Germans emigrated to America, they brought the Christmas tree with them and we Americans borrowed it along with many other Christmas customs.—Indiana Farmer's Guide.

Printed Christmas Card Was Issued Back in '43

THERE is more humanity about the Victoria and Albert museum than its stiff brick exterior suggests.

The director has sent me a Christmas Picture Book, says a writer in the London Star. It reveals the fact that the first Christmas card ever printed was issued only as recently as 1843.

The card, which was printed for Sir Henry Cole, first director of the South Kensington museum, is reproduced, along with many other efforts by artists, to celebrate the nativity. They range from a walrus ivory relief from Cologne to a modern woodcut by Eric Gill. It is strange to see how the artistic wheel has turned full circle back to the medieval austerity.

But I can't help liking the first Christmas card, which "features," as the films say, a hearty meal. As the fat boy would say, "I likes eating best."

THREE CELEBRATIONS

THREE Christmases are celebrated every year in the Church of Nativity at Bethlehem. The first occurs in the Roman Catholic section on December 25; 13 days later the Greek Orthodox church hold their celebrations, to be followed by those of the Armenian church in another 13 days.

WHAT PATIENT NEEDED

A certain young woman of Punxsutawney, Pa., had been a patient at a hospital there. Though sent home as well, she kept returning day after day, insisting she was still out of sorts. The staff doctors could find no symptoms and were greatly worried. "It's a funny thing," she remarked one day, "I seem to feel all right as long as my temperature is being taken." They gave her a thermometer to carry home so that she could take her own temperature. She has not been back since.

FRIEND OR ENEMY, WIND REMAINS A MYSTERY TO MAN

Of all nature's forces the wind is perhaps the most intangible. Where it comes from and whither it goes no one knows. It can be a kindly friend or a ruthless enemy. It brings showers, clouds or sunny hours; it caresses with a delicate touch or strikes a devastating blow.

Writers of great literature have recognized the wind and its place in the scheme of things since Bible times, for we find in Genesis 3:8, "the cool of the day," margined to mean the wind of the day.

The Athenians gave names to their winds. There was Boreas, the north wind with an icy breath; Aphellotis, the wind from the east; Notos, the breath of the south, and Zephyros, the west wind. By these names the winds from the four quarters were personalized, and in Athens, near the Acropolis, there is still standing a temple built 22 centuries ago known as the Tower of the Winds.

Shakespeare, who drew so largely from nature, makes more than 200 illusions to the wind in his writings. Dickens in more modern times said in one of his stories, "I am always conscious of an uncomfortable sensation now and then when the wind is blowing in the east." And George Eliot writes, "but certain winds make men's tempers bad." Emerson, the American classicist, among his numerous allusions to this force, referred to "the pious wind . . . forgetting . . . prophetic," and in other ways.

The terrible force of the wind is best described by Conrad, virile writer of the sea, in "Typhoon," when he says, "a furious gale attacks him like a personal enemy, tries to grasp his limbs, fastens on his mind, seeks to rout his very spirit out of him."

To the effects of a terrible wind in West Indies we owe the fact that Alexander Hamilton was brought into American history. Born in the little island of Nevis, a British possession in the West Indies, his youth was spent on the island of St. Croix, a Danish possession. Not yet sixteen he wrote a description of a violent wind before the terrors had worn off and while its effects were still visible. Printed in the island paper the story made such an impression upon the governor that the anonymous writer was discovered. This incident was the peg upon which his career turned.—Columbus (Ohio) Dispatch.

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spree. Hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters, finding Franz plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Franz in a fist fight, the Polaris crew assumes that Drake is Flynn's son, and he takes charge, as "Young Jim." A photograph of Kate intrigues him immensely. Steve gains the friendship of LaFane, woods scout. Franz discovers Drake's impersonation. Threatened with disclosure, Steve accuses Franz of attempting to murder him, exhibiting evidence, and the man dare not act. Steve sends LaFane to find Young Jim and sober him up. Steve wins the friendship of MacDonald, who owns timber land vital to the Flynn interests and the Scotsman gives him an option for Polaris to buy his timber. Franz plans to put Steve out of the way, but the latter outwits him. Knowing Drake has wired Kate at Chicago, Franz steals her reply from the telegraph office and learns that $25,000 is to be forwarded, and the time of its arrival. He plans to steal the $25,000.

—14—

"All right. I make camp somewhere close. I stay away but be your girl."

"No, no! I think you're fine, Mary, but I can't have you for my girl. You see, we don't travel the same trail. I go one way; you go another. Understand? Some day you want to get married. Sure! Priest and everything. Me, I don't think I'll get married right away. Maybe never. When I do, I'll marry a white girl. It is better that white people marry whites and that Indians marry Indians. You're young yet. How old are you, anyhow? Don't know?"—as she shook her head. "I'll bet you're not much over eighteen, anyhow.

"When your father dies you should go back to school. You are smart. You can learn a great deal from teachers and maybe they can learn something from you. You're the best quill worker I know of. You're an Ojibway and should be proud of it. You should keep on being Ojibway. Do the things your mother did; marry an Ojibway boy; have plenty of Ojibway papooses. It's our trails, remember. You go the Indian way, I go the white man's way. They can't cross. Understand that?"

"No," she said and looked away and a suggestion of disappointment rested about her red mouth. It was not pain, not despair; just an acceptance of frustration, perhaps, and it touched Steve profoundly.

"I won't be here very long, now, Mary," he said. "I may be going any time, now. I will go, perhaps, even before your father dies. I don't know where. I haven't any plan. But before I go I'm going to look you up and see how your father is and fix it some way so Franz won't bother you even after I'm out of the country. You'd better get along back, now. Want a canoe?"

"No. I walk fast in the woods."

"Aren't you hungry?"

She had risen and looked at him in a manner which made him wince. It was not a conscious glance of reproach, but her face reflected a hunger such as he had not had in mind when he put the question. She was starved, silently crying for nourishment; but it was not a hunger of the body, not meat and drink which she needed.

"I have bread," she answered. "I go now. Good-by, Jim."

"Good-by, Mary."

She walked down the trail to where another branched off to take her along the lake shore and Drake stood alone feeling small and humiliated.

His sense of having failed so miserably to meet a situation clung. It bothered him and that was why he gave the arrival of McNally's team no heed for the moment and did not even look out when the jingle of tug chains and the chuck of heavy wheels heralded the coming.

When he glanced up McNally was clambering down over the wagon wheel and, standing where she had risen from her place on the seat, was a girl. Outlined there against the sky, she was a Diana. Her laced pacs were trim; the riding breeches encased finely molded legs. A gay shirt fitted well over a slender torso and square, boyish shoulders. Her throat rose in a fine column and her head, flung back with the brisk breeze blowing tendrils of fair hair about it, seemed like a posture of brave defiance to the white bandage which covered her eyes.

Kate Flynn! Kate Flynn, holding in both hands a worn brief case. Kate Flynn, coming herself as a saving messenger for Polaris!

Strength trickled out of Steve's body. She was more fair to look upon than he had ever dreamed in all those dreams he had had of her fairness through these feverish weeks and it was this beauty which weakened him, not the thought that here was the person whom he could not deceive, that his pretense of being Young Jim must end now and the truth about that individual at last be told.

The girl leaned down, groping with her free hand for McNally's support. She talked softly and rapidly and laughed as one will in excitement, and old Mac, seeing Steve in the doorway, called out to him:

"Jim! Oh, Jim! Here's Katie herself!"

The girl stopped talking as McNally, taking her in his arms, swung her to the ground. The narrow bandage covered her eyes, the windows to the heart's expression, but it could not wholly hide the high eagerness which possessed her. She started forward eagerly, leading McNally toward the store rather than being led herself.

"Jim!" she called, and her voice was as lovely to the ear as her body was to the eye. "Duffer, I'm here! . . . Duffer, I couldn't send anybody else. I had to come myself!"

Steve moved down the steps and halted awaiting her approach in the deepest confusion he had ever experienced.

"Where are you Duffer?" she cried, breathlessly.

She stopped, withdrawing her hands from McNally's.

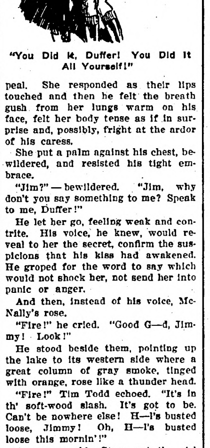
"Jim! Jimmy? Where are you?"

Steve stepped forward, then, swallowing drily, and took both her small hands. She clutched his convulsively, drawing herself close, touching his body with hers.

He went slightly giddy. She was freeing her hands, now, lifting them, letting them creep about his neck hungrily and her breath was uneven as she whispered to him:

"You did it, Duffer! You did it all yourself! You're the old Dad's son for certain. . . ."

She pulled his face down, offering her lips. He wrapped his arms about her; he kissed her on the mouth, a long lingering kiss unable to resist the impulse before the strength of her appeal. She responded as their lips touched and then he felt the breath gush from her lungs warm on his face, felt her body tense as if in surprise and, possibly, fright at the ardor of his caress.



"You Did It, Duffer! You Did It All Yourself!"

She put a palm against his chest, bewildered, and resisted his tight embrace.

"Jim?"—bewildered. "Jim, why don't you say something to me? Speak to me, Duffer!"

He let her go, feeling weak and contrite. His voice, he knew, would reveal to her the secret, confirm the suspicions that his kiss had awakened. He groped for the word to say which would not shock her, not send her into panic or anger.

And then, instead of his voice, McNally's rose.

"Fire!" he cried. "Good G—d, Jimmy! Look!"

He stood beside them, pointing up the lake to its western side where a great column of gray smoke, tinged with orange, rose like a thunder head.

"Fire!" Tim Todd echoed. "It's in th' soft-wood slash. It's got to be. Can't be nowhere else! H—l's busted loose, Jimmy! Oh, H—l's busted loose this mornin'!"

Almost roughly Steve put the girl to one side and ran from the store down to the beach so he might be beyond the scattered trees and see better.

Fire for certain! The thing which he had feared and prepared for through these weeks of drought had come but, because of it, he would not for this hour at least be forced to unmask and tell this girl that her brother, so far as any man at Good-Bye knew, was still a wastrel, was still bearing the shame of a trust betrayed.

Calmly and rapidly he gave his orders.

The few available men at headquarters were assembled; the fire fighting equipment held there for such emergencies was rushed to the lake shore; outboard motors were clamped to two large, flat-bottomed boats and the pumps and shovels and axes loaded.

Within a surprisingly brief time the laden boats were heading up the lake across the head of which, now, drifted the first outriders of a heavy smoke pall.

And up there in the timber, to the southward of the burning slash, a man fled rapidly. For a mile or more he ran stoutly and then the toll of that exertion slowed his pace. He dropped to a walk but when his breathing became less strained he jogged on again. Once he paused at an opening near the water and stared out at the boats making their way up the lake. His mouth twitched as he watched them.

The weather had played into Franz's hands. Had it rained the night before, his well laid scheme would have fallen to uselessness. But it had not rained. Heat would be great toward midday and there was no sign of a change in the skies.

Ever since his arrival at Good-Bye, Steve Drake had been insistent that every man in Polaris' employ be ready at a moment's notice to give battle to fire. As the weather hazard increased he had been constantly on the alert for reports of smoke.

Today, the money which was to remove the Laird's timber forever from the horizon of Franz's hopes would arrive at headquarters. Timed properly, the alarm of fire would drain the place of every able man and once that brief case which Franz had seen McNally place carefully beneath the blanket on the wagon seat in Shoestring passed out of the possession of the Flynns or their loyal help without being delivered to MacDonald, the principal point in his plotting would be achieved.

So the man had waited even past the time when fire would take a rapid hold. Then he had heaped materials together against a huge pile of brush, applied the match which would send a destroying element on its way, and turned in flight southward, the direction of headquarters.

Fire is a dual element: man's first friend, or his worst enemy. Those woodsmen in the boats knew what a fire meant, starting in that resinous slash, with the whole country like tinder. It would leap across the country, burst upon the stand of green swamp tinder with such a fury that spruce and balsam, cedar and pine would flare like torches, leaving valuable timber dead and spoiling in its wake.

It seemed to Steve that the boat scarcely crawled, as if Good-Bye lake expanded, stretched out its boundaries; as though many hours instead of less than one elapsed before he cut off his motor and leaped out.

Men flung themselves into the shallow water, carrying equipment with them and Wartin, who had seen their approach, came running.

"Got your crew all on it?" Steve called.

"Yes; just now. But, G—d, Jim, she licked up four-five forties before we could even git in here! She's goin' like h—l itself!"

The man was badly frightened.

"Going to be licked without a try?" Drake snapped. "Get hold of yourself, Wartin! Where've you put your men?"

A small crew was behind the fire, armed with shovels to throw sand and hold the line from crawling back against the wind. A larger detail was on the western flank, supplied with hand water pumpers, trying to squeeze the fire toward the lake, to keep it from widening in their direction.

"We'll start in at the creek and backfire the whole works," Steve answered decisively. "Maybe we can't stop it from crossing but nobody'll ever say we didn't try! Hop, now! We'll fire a few rods at a time and see what kind of job of holding it we can do."

He knew that he was taking a long chance, setting a fire to work backward toward a phalanx of approaching flame, burning the ground clean as it went so that when the main front met it there would be no food to feed it. If his backfire got away, if the wind threw brands from it over the heads of his men on the creek and they could not control the islands of flame so started, surely they would lose nothing but desperate effort. If they waited for night, the proper time for backfiring when heavy and quiet air becomes an ally of the fighters, the front surely would have reached the green timber and might be a raging monster beyond any human control.

Drake with a gasoline torch set fire to the first brush piles. They ignited with a vengeance, orange flames licking into the brittle stuff, melting the piles down, throwing themselves upward in ragged banners, snarling, snapping and roaring.

He set twenty rods of fire and then waded the stream that he might better watch his handiwork and the functioning of the crew.

The men, he saw, believed their fight hopeless and he rushed in among them.

"Give me that pumper!" he cried to one and pulled the device from the fellow's back. "Hot?"—as the man made his excuse. "Hot as the hubs of h—l! But that's all the more reason for keeping after it. . . ."

Crouched low, he edged in, closer than the closest of them. He held his breath because the air was liquid heat. He bent his head and smelled burning wool as even his clothing, though soaked in the creek, began to singe.

"Shovels, now," he croaked. "Get your shovelers in, Mac! Close in, you!"

Sand as well as water commenced to fly. The burning spot was surrounded by fighters. The skin of Steve's face was taut and dry with the torture of heat. It seemed as if his lips cracked open, but they were making headway, checking the spread of the fire, driving it back.

"Good!" he panted, relaxing a trifle. "Three of you keep her where she is, now. Bury everything with sand that smokes. Spread out, the rest of you . . . Yonder! There's another one!"

Mattson, chairman of the society picnic committee.

The pageant has been prepared and is directed by Mrs. Ella K. Govt. Buys Cattle Shipment to market of 85 additional carloads of starving cattle from Minnesota, North and South Dakota was announced Tuesday by drought relief officials in St. Paul.

This makes a total to date of 164 carloads, or approximately 5,750 head of stock, which actually have been sent from farm to market. Purchase of drouth-stricken cattle is far ahead of shipments, which have only begun. In North Dakota alone, the federal emergency relief administration has bough more than 50,000 head of cattle.

Out of the 85 carload shipment this week, seventy originated in Minnesota, 11 in South Dakota and four in North Dakota. Shipping points in Minnesota included Rice, Kent, Little Falls, Wheaton, Villard, Lake Lillian, Clinton and many other towns in the drouth area; in South Dakota, Faulton, Phillips and Hetland, and in North Dakota, Cando and Hazelton.

Chester Larson, who is employed in the office of Peterson-Biddick at Thief River Falls, spent Sunday with home folks.

Many people from here attended the Marshall county creameries picnic at the Old Mill site on Sunday. It was estimated that about 5000 people were there. The Holt Community band furnished the music for the occasion.

Primary Election To Come Off Next Monday--June 18

Voters Are Cautioned Not to Split Their Ballot

The Primary Election is due to come off on Monday, June 18 and we were asked to mention this fact although we know that you must have heard about it by now as there has been a lot of candidates around asking you for your vote.

There are many nice fellows running, on the county as well as on the state ballot and we hope that you will not have any difficulty in choosing the man whom you think will serve you best in the coming years in office

Do not forget that you can not vote wild this year as you must stick to the party on the blanket ballot in order to make your vote count. If you vote for a man in each party then your vote will not count. So try to be very careful in placing your crosses so that you will derive full benefit from the time spent at the polls.

All the parties have good candidates and we are not in a position to say which you should support as we do not know the choice of the people in such a large county and state. Get out and cast your vote for the local candidates.

Deliver Your Cream Early During The Summer Months

We are now approaching the time of the year when warm weather is about to set in. This means that frequent deliveries of cream are more necessary. Early deliveries of cream will help a great deal at this time to keep up the quality of our butter.

Cream delivered in the morning has no chance to sour which otherwise may happen, causing a loss to both the patron and creamery. We ask your cooperation on this.

The Reason Why - -

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

SYNOPSIS

Stephen Drake, with his four-year-old son, is rescued from a blizzard by Jim Flynn, big timber operator, and Drake, until his death, impresses on the boy, Steve, the debt they owe "Old Jim." Twenty years later, Steve meets "Young Jim" Flynn, his benefactor's son. Sent by Old Jim, incapacitated through an accident in which Kate, his daughter, is temporarily blinded, to take charge of the company's—the Polaris—woods operations, the youth is indulging in a drunken spree. Hoping to do something for Old Jim, Steve hastens to the company's headquarters, finding Franz plotting against the Flynn interests. Worsting Franz in a fist fight, the Polaris crew assumes that Drake is Flynn's son, and he takes charge, as "Young Jim." A photograph of Kate intrigues him immensely. Steve gains the friendship of LaFane, woods scout. Franz discovers Drake's impersonation. Threatened with disclosure, Steve accuses Franz of attempting to murder him, exhibiting evidence, and the man dare not act. Steve sends LaFane to find Young Jim and sober him up. Steve wins the friendship of MacDonald, who owns timber land vital to the Flynn interests and the Scotsman gives him an option for Polaris to buy his timber. Franz plans to put Steve out of the way, but the latter outwits him. Knowing Drake has wired Kate at Chicago, Franz steals her reply from the telegraph office and learns that $25,000 is to be forwarded, and the time of its arrival. He plans to steal the $25,000. Kate, bringing the money, comes to headquarters. Her eyes are bandaged, and before Steve has to betray himself by speech a forest fire alarm is sounded. Drake hastens to take charge of the fire fighters.

—15—

A second serious blaze was developing, set by sparks from his backfire, and wallowing through the down-stuff a half dozen men followed him to another interval of heart-breaking, lung-searing work.

"Coming great, lads!" he cried when that particular engagement was won. "That's the stuff that makes little poker hands win and licks fires!"

They grinned at him.

"All right, Mac. She's cooler, now. Cross over and touch off some more. Give us a few minutes every ten rods or so and don't get caught yourself. Keep to the west of your backfire all the time."

He made his way eastward, mounting a sharp little knoll so he could have a fair view of the terrain.

He could hear his backfire snapping and muttering as it worked away from him; could see McNally setting more. On beyond, great plumes of smoke gushed upward eruptively as the front of the main fire opened and closed again, its points joining forces here and there to create great quantities of gas.

It was coming rapidly. Two, perhaps three miles an hour that front was traveling. His backfire was small and relatively cool, and still he had held the first section of it by the skin of his teeth! What would happen if the main fire reached the creek before he had burned a gap all across its way, or if the wind rose higher to make it roll even more rapidly?

For a full half mile to the westward that backfire must be laid in before the front of the burning area would be wholly blocked. McNally, observing the quickening advance of the main front, worked rapidly, finished his task and then, red-eyed and coughing, his shirt scorched on the breast, came floundering across the stream and joined those who fell upon the spots of fire started by raining sparks borne across the creek. It did not seem to Steve that his crew could possibly hold the pace for the length of time that would be required.

He needed men, now; all along this battle line he needed them; more men and fresh men, because an hour in there was more exacting than a dozen at ordinary labor.

And the men were coming. At least, two men. They had been coming down the Good-Bye since early day and as they saw the smoke they came faster, paddling in quick cadence. They were stalwart men. LaFane, in the stern, sat as straight as a proud Indian. The other was not quite so large of frame, not so deep in color, but young Jim Flynn's eyes were clear, his mouth set in a line of assuring firmness and he bore his share of the task with relish. A different boy, this, from the one who had been kidnaped from his camp in a drunken stupor days before; another lad than the one who had defied his captor and sulked and sworn that he would not do as bidden. Resolution, ability seemed to be his characteristics this hot, windy morning as the canoe finally cut the waters of Good-Bye lake.

From the knoll on which he was directing the redistribution of his forces, Steve Drake could have observed the landing of that canoe, but his eyes and attention were centered on the area [illegible] to save from destruction [illegible] aware of their arrival until they approached, LaFane in the lead.

The crew was now making a valiant effort to keep the backfire from crossing the road and finding a hold in that hazardous area. Watching all this, considering the possibilities of failure, planning how he could get his men back to the creek should they take a licking over there, Drake gave no special heed to the two who came up to him. He was aware of their coming, but took for granted that they were of the crew.

"One of you—" he began, pointing toward a place that needed guarding.

He stopped short. He had addressed LaFane. The upraised hand sagged and then he turned to stare at Young Jim.

The boy looked straight into the eyes of the man who, for these weeks, had used his name. It was a hard look, a square look, difficult to determine because of its sobriety whether it was one of regard or offense. And then, after a moment, the lad smiled.

"You're Steve Drake," he said and put out his hand.

Steve did not speak. He was searching the other's countenance and thinking swiftly of what hinged on the nature of LaFane's handiwork. The real Young Jim was here, now. Pretense was done, a play ended. The Flynns must from this hour take their destinies in their own hands and win or lose.

He shot an inquiring glance at LaFane. The man's lips twitched and his eyes smoldered.

"You bet!" he said in response to the unspoken query and his voice carried more enthusiasm than Drake had ever heard in it before.

"Good!" he muttered. "You've hit the job at the right time, Jim! Until now, I've run things high, wide and handsome, but from now on—"

"Not yet, Drake! Lord, man, you've got to stay on the job through this! I'm just bringing in another pair of hands and a tolerably good back. What'll you have me do first?"

That was good sense. Even though he was no longer even a usurper of authority Steve could not even take time to confer with the newcomer. His task, this day, could not be shouldered on another.

But as he outlined what had happened, what had been done, how he had spread his forces, he was anticipating: What would the men think, when they knew? This boy, come to take charge, must have them with him from the beginning to avoid trouble. Knowing what he had been they might be reluctant to accept him for what LaFane evidently now believed him to be. It was not going to be clear sailing for Young Jim.

"LaFane, if you'll drop over to the left, there, and spell some of the boys who're all in, it'll help a lot. Flynn, I'll find a chore for you in a second."

He started walking down the slope with the older man, leaving Young Jim alone.

The boy stood there and drew a hand that shook with excitement across his lips. His job! On the ground, after such a start, and to encounter such a complication for a beginning! LaFane's quiet recital of Drake's achievement was in his mind, now, and he was humble before his past and the prospect of his future . . . and humble, as well, before the man who had used his name with such effect.

As he stood there, the whirlwind came. It swept across the unburned slash between its point of origin and the line of backfire, swinging in a majestic terrible arc. At the top it was a whirling cloud of smoke; at the tip of its dangling funnel, it was a shower of sparks, and these, as Young Jim watched, were sowed behind the fire fighters in the bend. Grass burst into flame; the wicked tongues found hold in the conflagration in front of them, were hedged in by an orange barrier from the rear.

Young Jim cried out but his voice did not carry. He saw the ring of flame rise and broaden, touching with explosive tentacles all material close by.

A half moon of unburned slash was all that the men yonder had for safety. All along the roadway before them fire was running; behind, that ragged semicircle of new flames was closing gaps to wall them in. At the center of this zone Jim made out a small pond, a hundred feet across, perhaps; it offered a haven of a sort. He raced down the slope, tripping once and falling, slashing his cheek on a sharp stub. He was up, cursing as he wallowed in a deceptive pile of brush, hidden by young growth, and threw himself into the creek, fighting his way through the alders on the far side.

He came out into the chopping and swung to the right, shouting once more in an attempt to make those men aware of their danger. The gap in the line of fire for which he was headed closed to solid flame as a vagrant blast of air sent the blazes crackling through dry grass.

He raced back to the left, seeking a way through, but before he reached the next opening that also closed. He coughed from smoke, now, and his eyes were tortured. The fire snapped and pluffed at him as if in conscious mockery. He brushed tears from his eyes and strove to locate the little pond, trying to determine whether, could he attract attention, those men would be able to gain that one sanctuary in what, within minutes, would be an inferno. But smoke obscured a view of the water. He found a place between two windrows of litter that was not yet ablaze. He edged toward the narrow opening and recoiled as the shirt curled on his shoulders from the heat that beat upon him from either side. He could not go into that; it was beyond human endurance. And yet as a fresh puff of wind struck him, he knew that he must. Human lives depended on the ability of his body and will to withstand the ordeal of fire.

He had only a dozen steps to take before he would be through the worst, and he held his lungs flat so he would not breathe flame. The skin bulged to blisters on his neck, the hair on one temple singed and he felt the fire licking for his legs as he summoned all of his strength, and with one final effort, ran.

He was through, choking, weakened by the heat, but through. He was within the ring of fire, charging across the acres that would be raging at any instant.

The men were losing their fight. At three points the backfire had crossed the road and was running, rolling with the wind. They were still in front of it, giving ground grudgingly, fighting as they retreated, ready to come to a full stand at the creek, and it was not until this young stranger, blackened and blistered, burst upon the nearest trio who fought side by side that they turned to see through the flowing haze that other wall of flame licking toward them from the rear.

"Into the pond!" Jim croaked. "You're cut off. . . . The pond!"

One man dropped his shovel and fled madly. The others clung to their equipment as they made a break for water.

Jim ran on to the next group, floundering and still trying to shout from his smoke-hoarsened throat. McNally finally heard him. He turned, saw what was coming and ran.

A narrow ribbon of water was just at their left. It was the slender arm of the pond, lying in a swale. Along its edge flame spears danced but it offered a way through. They sank to their thighs in the mire, gained the deeper water of the pond and threw themselves down, only their heads above the surface, faces buried in the green leatherleaf on the low banks which would not burn and which pocketed life-giving air.

That was early afternoon. It was four hours later before the burn had cooled enough to let them make a break for the creek bank and cross.

On the high land yonder a wearied but still vigilant line of men stood. They had made their stand and had won. At a thousand points snags and stumps were burning but the backfire had finally held, the red menace was thwarted.

The group of men who followed Young Jim across the creek were naturally undemonstrative and they stopped on the higher ground and looked self-conscious and foolish as others clustered around. Silently, one of them took and shook Jim's hand and more would have done the same had the boy not laughed them off.

But McNally had something to say and said it grimly.

"If it hadn't been for you," he declared, "six of us 'd 've fried to a crisp. You done it. Whoever you are, young man, you're all there!"

Steve, standing at a little distance, saw in the faces of the company the thing that he had stirred himself on his first evening at headquarters: respect, admiration, an admission of that superiority which makes men willing to follow another. But between the two incidents was a difference. He, Steve Drake, had only whipped a rascal; this Young Jim, now showing confusion himself, had saved lives. From that moment on, those men of the Polaris crew were his to command.

CHAPTER IX

Evening, now, but it had been fresh morning when Steve Drake left headquarters.

Alone on the threshold of the store Kate Flynn had stood as the boats buzzed away, fingers working against her palms.

"Who are you?" Kate asked sharply as he approached.

"It's me. Tim Todd, Katie. Don't you recollect—"

"Oh, Tim!" She put out a hand, groping for his and clutched his gnarled old fingers tightly. "Tim, does it look bad?"

"Well, Katie, it looks pretty bad; but, then, it might look a lot worse, too. I reckon they'll get her down in about two-three jerks. With Young Jim on th' job I guess even fire's goin' to have a time of it, doin' much damage."

"Yes, Jim . . ." the girl said, as if to herself. "Tim, tell me,"—quickly. "Tell me about this . . . about Young Jim."

"About him? Shoo! How could I tell you anything about your brother? He's turned things inside out, here. I'll be dusted if he ain't done things that nobody ever dremp' could be done! He's better 'n a chip off th' old block, I say!"

"Yes, he's done wonderfully well," the girl murmured and placed finger tips against lips that still burned from that strange kiss. "But tell me," she began, resolved to learn something of this man who had held her in his arms, who was referred to as her brother but who, she well knew, was not her brother.

"Lordy, lookit her roll now!" the old man moaned and Kate commenced to tremble, torn as she was between conflicting, and dramatic, interests.

"Is it going fast? How does it look, now?"

OBEYING ORDERS

When supper was served Helen refused a second helping of ice cream with a polite but wistful, "No, thank you!"

"Do have some more, dear," her hostess urged.

"Mother told me to say, 'No, thank you,'" Helen explained naively, "but I don't think she could have known how small the first helping was going to be!"—Toronto Globe.

Don't feel too highly flattered when some one asks for your John Hancock. A movie actress reports that one day she was solicited for her autograph by two small boys.

"Do you know who I am?" she asked them.

"No'm," the older boy answered, "but we thought we could find out this way."—Boston Transcript.

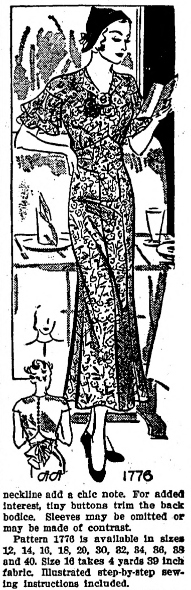
PRINT FROCK THAT IS WORTHY PLACE IN ANY WARDROBE

PATTERN 1776

There's nothing like a print frock to suggest spring—to brighten up our wardrobe—and our spirits! We'd love the model sketched here in one of the colorful all-over designs so popular this season. It has truly flattering, feminine lines—the gracefully flared sleeves, the slim semi-belted waistline and length-giving skirt panel. With the neckline worn open, artificial flowers posed at the neckline add a chic note. For added interest, tiny buttons trim the back bodice. Sleeves may be omitted or may be made of contrast.



Pattern 1776 is available in sizes 12, 14, 16, 18, 20, 30, 32, 34, 36, 38 and 40. Size 16 takes 4 yards 39 inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address orders to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 243 West Seventeenth Street, New York City.

ENCOURAGEMENT

While the young suitor was waiting to take out his young lady the latter's little sister entered the room.

"Did you know my sister's got three other boy friends?" said the child.

The suitor pricked up his ears at this piece of news.

"Really!" he said, in surprise. "I haven't seen any of them."

"Neither have I," returned the child, "but she gave me a quarter to tell you."—Border Cities Star.

Bad for Both

Major (telling of big-game hunting)—There we stood, the tiger and I, in the thick of the jungle, face to face!

Dumb Dora—Oh, Major, how perfectly frightful it must have been for both of you!

The High Hatter

"Have you ever high-hatted anybody?"

"Not for a long time," answered Senator Sorghum. "Not since I used to make faces at the class when the teacher required me to wear a tall, conical dunce cap."

Very

"What is this?"

"Our college has established a chair of humor."

"But this is a collapsible chair."

"We thought that would be humorous."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Her Wish

"So Nellie married a farmer. And she always said she would marry a man of culture."

"Well, she did. A man of agriculture."

Easy

Teacher—Johnny, can you use "sphere" in a sentence?

Johnny (after much thought)—Yes, ma'am. My little sister has a sphere cold.

Son Is Accused of Father's Murder

Arrested While Escorting Body to Burial Place.

Kansas City.—Bartholomew J. Scannell, thirty-three, was walking toward the baggage car in which the body of his sixty-three-year-old father had been transported from Florida to be buried here beside his mother, when two city detectives arrested him for the murder of his father.

"You are under arrest," the officers told him.

"Why?" Scannell queried.

"On request of the sheriff of Jacksonville, Fla., we were asked to hold you in connection with your father's death," O. A. Lindsey, one of the detectives, answered, while G. A. Carter, his partner was putting handcuffs on Scannell.

Father Found Murdered.

Scannell's father, John F. Scannell, a poultry farmer living on a six-acre farm near Dinsmore, Fla., eleven miles north of Jacksonville, was found murdered five days before.

Apparently the crime had been committed two days before the body was found in a small shed. An ax had been used by the killer. Sheriff W. B. Calhoun claims to have an eye-witness of the slaying.

Protesting he knew nothing about the death of his father until he was notified at Tampa, Fla., young Scannell requested permission to have the plans for the funeral carried out.

Scannell said that he would return to Florida gladly. There was no motive for him to have killed his father, he asserted, indicating that debts on his father's farm exceeded the $2,000 insurance.

Had Other Property.

A dispatch from Florida, however, said that the father was thought to have had other property besides the farm. Herbert Taylor, Tampa, said to be a close friend of Scannell, also is accused.

The information against Scannell came from W. H. Higginbotham and his two brothers, D. R. and Lee, who lived near the elder Scannell's farm.

The Scannells formerly lived in Kansas City, where the son graduated from high school. His mother died about two years ago.

Scannell said his father went to Florida and settled there about two years ago.

Short Note Arrives Late for Romance

Princeton, Ind.—A romance which had its beginning during the World war brought its first result recently, but faded almost as rapidly as it came to light.

When Miss Anna May Miller was employed in the Jeffersonville (Ind.) government quartermaster depot, she wrote her name and address on a slip of paper and pinned it to a shirt which she had made.

Recently a letter came from a soldier stationed in Hawaii, who had received the shirt, answering her letter. But its writer now is Mrs. Harvey Deering and mother of three children.

The sugar cane planter had been blind twenty years.

Hen Kills Eaglets Placed in Her Care

Cleveland.—Two of the three eaglets which were hatched recently in the biological laboratory of Western Reserve university have died, while the third is thriving.

The two died of injuries inflicted by their foster-mother, a setting hen, in stepping on them. It was believed the three birds were the first eagles ever hatched in captivity.

New Turk Language Is Proving Problem

Commission Reaches Letter 'B' After 2 Years Toil.

Istanbul, Turkey.—Making the new Turkish language is proving a difficult task. A commission has been sitting at Angora for over two years composing the grammar and the dictionary. But in the latter it has not got beyond the letter B, and the former is only just about to be released to the public.

The difficulties are great. It is being based on the French Larousse dictionary, every word in which is to have a new Turkish equivalent. As Turkish was never a very rich language and as all the Arabic and Persian words are being eliminated, it means that a large proportion of the vocabulary has to be invented.

Turkish, too, never had any modern scientific or psychological terms, and so these, again, which constitute such a large part of modern vocabularies, have to be created. The commissioners try to find Turkish roots out of which they can legitimately compose the equivalents of modern European scientific terminology.

In the letter A alone the new words invented amount to over 10,000. Many Turks say they are unpalatable mouthfuls and will never be used by the ordinary man. They accuse the commissioners of inventing a literary language different from the vernacular, which was exactly one of the dangers they were set to avoid.

Texas Students Find Evidence of Old Race

Lubbock, Texas.—Human skeletons and implements of a civilization which existed about 1,800 years ago were unearthed alongside the Tecolote river near Las Vagas, N. M., by members of the 1931 Texas Technological college archeological expedition.

Digging in ruins, the eleven students who comprised the party found several skeletons—presumably of Indians, who lived there centuries before this country was discovered—and arrowheads, stone drills and other articles.

A study of Aztec culture at Mexico City has been planned tentatively for the college's 1932 expedition.

Planes in U. S. Increase 417 in Last Six Months

Washington.—Aviation's increasing popularity is illustrated in Department of Commerce figures showing 417 more airplanes in use July 1 than January 1. Increases in the first six months of the year were shown in both licensed craft and in licensed pilots and mechanics.

The number of licensed pilots increased by almost 1,000, from 15,280 to 16,238. There were 445 licensed women pilots and five women mechanics.

Licensed aircraft increased by 104—from 7,358 to 7,458. New York State had the largest number, 225. Illinois was second and California third. These three states also led in pilots and mechanics as well as in total aircraft. New York, July 1, had 1,100 aircraft, licensed and unlicensed; California was second and Illinois third. In pilots they ranked California first, then New York and Illinois.

Gliders were most numerous in California, with Michigan second and New York third. There were 100 licensed gliders and 1,107 unlicensed.

Angler Believes Catfish Ate Water Moccasin

Sulphur, Okla.—Will a fish eat a snake? That is the question J. I. Young, veteran sportsman and fisherman, is attempting to answer.

Examining his lines one evening, Young discovered a large water moccasin on a hook. Not wishing to remove a live snake from the hook in the darkness, he decided to leave it on the line until morning.

When he "ran" the line the next morning he found a forty-pound catfish on the hook which the evening before had held the snake.

Veteran Smithy Adds Garage to His Shop

East Kingston, N. H.—With the rise of motor vehicle popularity in recent years, many a village smithy has gone out of business. But Joe Lawrence seems to have solved this problem very nicely. For many years a blacksmith, he now operates a combination garage and blacksmith shop, catering to both motorists and horsemen as they come along.

Little Red Hen Runs Nest Time by Clock

Kinston, N. C.—A little red hen quits her nest regularly every day at 6:15 a. m., 12 o'clock noon and 5:45 p. m. for food and water, says W. R. Brinkley, her owner. One of her eggs, Brinkley claims, is flat shaped and bears a clock dial, a complete circle with 12 regularly spaced notches on it.

They looked at each other and as they looked a little moisture came to their eyes. They breathed fast like those near exhaustion. Neither uttered a word as they turned and pushed their runners toward the smoke. Nearing the place whence it proceeded they saw back in the timber, now bare of foliage, the hull and mast of a large shallop. Built upon it and around the mast was a little house with gray bark sides and small windows of isinglass. Alongside the hull and reaching upward some three fathoms a stone chimney had been built. At the steps leading to its door they got the grateful odor of frying fish. Suddenly a white man of middle age opened the door and looked down upon them with astonishment.

"In the name o' God who are you?" he asked in Dutch.

"Wanderers in the waste who have lived through a dozen miracles," Amos answered in the same language. "I think that you are an angel at the gate o' Paradise."

"Are you the lost men that Miss Weld and her brother have been looking for?" the Dutchman asked.

"The very same men," Amos answered. "This is Mr. Heathers. My name is Todkill."

"Well, well! We scoured the lake for you and some friendly Indians were helping us. I am Nicholas Van Brocklin. Miss Weld left a letter here for Mr. Heathers. Come in, come in and share my food and drink and shelter. I'm as lonely as a buck deer in the summer."

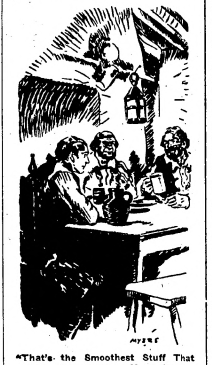
"I snum! This is splendidious!" the old pioneer exclaimed. "I'm kind o' slewed with happiness."

Amos and Robert sat on a rustic lounge covered with a beaver-skin robe. For a moment neither spoke. There was a grateful sense of warmth in the room.

Amos blew his nose and wiped his cheek and said presently, "I'm made o' hard stuff, but now I reckon we're like the boy who went off with Satan and by and by got back to his father's house."

Robert read the letter from Peggy aloud to Amos. These are its words:

"Dear Robert: We have spent a month in the wilderness trying to find you. I think that you may wonder why, but I am sure that if you have kept the medallion and have had the patience and the curiosity to wrest from its embrace the secret which it held, you will know why I have been glad to endure hardship and peril for your sake. It may be all in vain but I had to do my best. I pray God that this may fall in your hands. If it does it will open my heart and mind to you. Whatever you may have done I wish you to know that they are filled with the charity of St. Paul and of Jesus Christ. The magistrates, the church and every one I meet in Boston believe you to be in hiding because of your guilt. I do not share their opinion. It has been hard to stand against them but I stand. In the present state of feeling you would better not come to the colony. Take a ship for Holland at New Amsterdam. Let Todkill come and tell me what you have done and, if you wish it, I will go to you. We could meet at my father's house in dear old England.



"That's the Smoothest Stuff That Ever Slipped Down My Gullet."

"We have remained here to the last day and must now be going. I give this the caress you once begged of me not in vain.

"Yours faithfully,
"Peggy Weld."

Robert lifted the rose-scented sheet of paper to his lips and kissed it.

"Well, boys, supper will be ready in a minute," said Van Brocklin, as he took the fish and potatoes from the fire and began setting the table. He descended to the hold through a hatch in the floor and brought up butter and cold baked beans and bread and pumpkin sauce and a jug and a bottle of wine. He gave each of his guests a dram of gin and molasses called "black strap."

"That's the smoothest stuff that ever slipped down my gullet," said Amos with a shake of his right foot.

They spent a most delightful hour at the table.

Robert had thrown off his depression and was in a mood to celebrate the loss of it. His fear for his beloved friend William had left him, for it was clear that all the brethren were convinced of his innocence. As they ate, Amos told of Tawandoha and his melancholy fate in the far mountain country.

"Old Tawandoha!" the Dutchman exclaimed. "Always I bowed my head to him. He would never drink firewater. He was the bravest fighter, the wisest chief in the Long House. He was humane. Many a white man owes his life to old Tawandoha. He had a noble dignity and that was his only ornament. He would have no feathers and no gewgaws on his person."

Their host lived at Fort Orange on the North river. His sons and himself traded with the savages. In August the great hurricane which swept over the country drove their shallop ashore and bedded her so fast in the rising ground that they had not been able to get her back to water. They had built the little house above her to serve as a camp and headquarters on the Lake of the Iroquois, and brought timber for another shallop. The early deep snow had delayed their moving. His sons were over in the west end of the Long House more than a hundred leagues away. If Amos and Robert would stay and guard his camp he would go home for Christmas and return as soon as possible with sleds and help for his moving. Then Amos and Robert could go down to the fort with the party.

Sitting by the fireside with pipes and tobacco Nicholas said that the Iroquois would be coming south in a month or so with sledloads of meat and many captives. The meat taken in the upper mountains would come down the lake bound for the Long House. Unlike the nomad tribes of the north the Iroquois had learned to be a provident people but were quite as cruel as their neighbors. Many white men had been tortured and slain by them. They were now at peace with the Dutch but it was like thin ice, liable to break any moment. Power was the only thing they respected. White men would be secure when the savages were destroyed and not till then. Yes, he traded strong water for skins. If they didn't get it from him they would get it from others. He knew it was bad for them, but poisoned corn was also bad for crows. They were pests, and anything bad for them was good for the white man. You might as well try to make a hog fit for the parlor as try to civilize a savage.

Thus he voiced the sophistries of the rum trader, but Amos and Robert were in no mood to argue with him. After all they had seen they were quite willing to agree that savages were nearer to the beast than to men. Yet they were human, with certain admirable virtues which had rightly given hope to the good fathers in the north and to the rulers in New England.

The Dutchman gave them hot water for a bath, ointment with which to rid themselves of unpleasant company acquired in the Indian camps, and insisted that they occupy the two beds, while he took the lounge. They had a night of rest the like of which they had not known since leaving the hospitable roof of Madame Hebert.

In the morning, after a meal of dried fish and potatoes and blueberry cake with a refreshing hot drink made by stewing dried leaves of spearmint and raspberry, Van Brocklin washed the dishes and left his new friends.

These were his parting words: "You will find meat and flour and vegetables and drink in the hold. Help yourselves freely to anything you want. There is an abundance of fish in the lake. You have only to cut holes in the ice and bait and set your hooks. I shall return within ten days. I do not think that any Indians will be coming down the lake before then. Most of my strong water is buried in a snowdrift. If you stand firm and talk Dutch to them, they'll give you no bother."

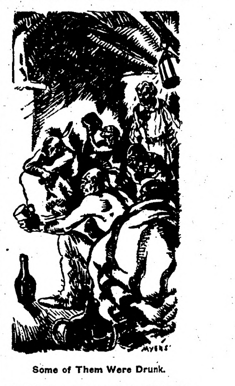
CHAPTER XI

The Coming of James Rosewell and Its Revelations

They had three delightful days of rest and comfort in the interesting boat-house of Nicholas Van Brocklin. Late in the third day a bitter wind from the northwest with snow began to whistle in the chimney and hiss against the bark walls. The bare branches of beech, birch and maple sang like whips. The frozen trees creaked and groaned, and now and then a report like a postol shot rang through the timbered slope when links of frost were broken. Leagues of the forest roof were bending and billowing in the blast. It reminded Amos of artillery fire when a great tree near them crashed down, clearing its way to the ground. They brought in a good store of wood.

Suddenly a band of twelve Iroquois hunters arrived, crowded into the house and literally took possession of it. They took off their racquets at the door. Their leader spoke a word of greeting. Then they shook themselves like dogs and sat down facing the fire, their blankets over their heads. There was no note of ill-nature in their conduct, but for a long time they were silent. Indians gave freely to honored guests. So presently they arose and began to help themselves to the stores of the little trading house—no doubt they felt entitled to its best hospitality. In spite of all the efforts of Amos to restrain them they ransacked the hold and drank all the wine and strong water they could find. They seized the meat, fish and vegetables, put them all in Van Brocklin's big brass kettle, boiled and devoured them. That evening the neat and cleanly room had become a noisome pen of prostrate, ill-smelling savages on the beds, lounge and the floor. Some of them were drunk but not sufficiently so to make them violent or quarrelsome.

The storm abated next morning and there being nothing to eat in the cabin, the Indians went away on their racquets. Amos and Robert hung the bed covers on a line for the day, washed the linen and scrubbed the floors, for the house had suddenly become a rookery. It was no light matter to be visited by a number of savages.



Some of Them Were Drunk.

The white men were on short rations of fish and wild duck—two of which Robert brought down with a musket which hung in the cabin—until about ten days had passed. The Dutchman came with sleds and two helpers and two unexpected guests—Mr. James Rosewell, of Boston, and his guide and protector, an officer from the fort below. He had come by ship to the island of the Manhados, then up the North river in a pinnace to the Dutch Fort Orange. There Van Brocklin had given him news of the men he sought. He coldly shook hands with Robert and Amos, saying:

"I have come a long way to find you."

"Thanks. It is a friendly thing to do," said Robert. "I am glad to tell you that we do not need help."

"But there are those in Boston who need your help," Rosewell rejoined.

"Who needs my help?"

"I reckon you know as well as I that William Heydon is suffering punishment for a crime. Most people are convinced that you committed it. I have come here on my own responsibility to ask you as a gentleman to tell me the truth and I rely wholly on your sense of justice and right."

"Tell we what has happened to my friend William Heydon," said Robert.

"He is suffering for adultery with one Mabel Hartley, once a servant in your house. At first she swore it on William. She fell ill and confessed to Harry Vane that she might have been in error as to the man. Later she said in my presence that her mind had changed—that as she gave more thought to the matter she was convinced that you and not William had been with her that night. Two days later the woman died of a fever in her lungs. William was released from prison and put on the limits of the town pending your return, the inhabitants and certain members of the court, especially Governor Vane, believing him to be innocent. But he has to wear around his neck a noose of hempen rope with a tail two feet long. This is a heavy burden, and it is your duty to him and to his friends to remove it."

It was a well-spoken argument, full of the note of sincerity. They were standing on the cleaned ice at the edge of the lake. Robert paced up and down in the shoveled area. He stood a moment looking off at the snow-laden forest. His face had paled. Both Amos and Rosewell watched him with interest. Amos' hands were trembling a little. There was a touching note of despair in Robert's voice as he turned and said:

"A rope on his neck! Every morning he gets up to be hanged again by the neck and to be gazed at by the crowd. My God! This is torture! It is burning a man up by inches. And Harry Vane is governor!"

No Wonder It's Hard

One reason a foreigner has a hard time learning our language is because we ourselves ball it all up. We say we drink up a pint of milk when we drink it down. We also say we drink a glass full of soda when we drink it empty.—Florida Times-Union.

Tree Transformation Is Puzzle to Scientists

It is one of the puzzles of science why some trees, long buried, turn to coal or oil, as they have done in Pennsylvania, and others change to stone as in the Far West.

For practical utilization, the oil and coal transformation means the most to the civilization of the United States. For scientific studies, however, the transformation of a tree or plant into several drops of oil ruins any chances of investigating the form or structure.

The remarkable preservation of California trees is accounted for, in part, by the complete freedom of their cells from decay fungus. This would be possible if they were buried while thoroughly wet.

The changes found in the wood were a slight degree of petrification—the turning to stone—, some crushing and a pronounced decrease in the soluble materials, cellulose and fibrous substance. In no case did the wood become coal-like or otherwise unrecognizable in its characteristics. Redwood, pine and cedar of Lebanon were included in the studies made.

"Tums" Builds a Home

St. Louis, Mo.—The palatial new building being erected by A. H. Lewis Medicine Co., is a fitting exemplification of the enthusiastic sentiment of millions of users of Tums.

It will present a striking appearance in its contrast of blue-black terra cotta base with mottled cream above the second floor and glittering gold finish on high vertical mullions. Upper windows, fifty feet high, will have gold effect strips between them and furnish abundant light, while lower portion will have etched windows and stainless steel decorations.

The building, machinery and equipment will cost between $100,000 and $150,000 and is to be used exclusively for the manufacture of Tums.—Adv.

Likes and Dislikes

"Do you enjoy freedom of speech?"

"Not always," answered Senator Sorghum. "I can't get along with the kind of man who insists on saying anything he likes in a way that makes everybody dislike him."

Attempt to Assassinate Ambassador Caffery in Havana—Arms Conference Meets in Geneva—Service Industries Codes Modified by President's Order.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

HAVANA police learned that there was a plot to assassinate Jefferson Caffery, American ambassador to Cuba, and to destroy American property on the island. They took extraordinary precautions to protect Mr. Caffery, but despite the presence of soldiers at the entrance to his home some unidentified assailants drove by in a car and poured a stream of bullets from sawed-off shotguns just at the time Mr. Caffery usually leaves for the yacht club. He was not injured but one of the soldiers was grievously wounded, his right leg being torn off by an explosive bullet. Mr. Caffery went on to the yacht club calmly and refused to say who he thought the assassins might be.

J. Caffery

Cuban government officials were greatly excited by the attempt on the ambassador's life, and there was an inclination to blame the Communists, but leaders of that party denied their followers had anything to do with it. In recent demonstrations the radicals have attacked Mr. Caffery in their speeches. Presumably the sole purpose is to stir up trouble between the governments of the United States and Cuba.

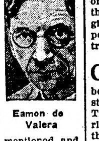
President Mendieta and nearly every cabinet member visited the ambassador's home and expressed regrets at the act of violence, and the cabinet held a special session to discuss the plot.

STATESMEN from many nations met in Geneva and reopened the sessions of the disarmament conference, with a full realization of the fact that their failure may mean the renewal of war in Europe in the not far future, and possibly the end of the League of Nations. Such hope as they had of breaking the impasse seemed to rest on the plan which Foreign Commissar Litvinov of Russia said he was ready to offer. It was believed he would concentrate on a policy of political security as a basis for disarmament. Norman H. Davis, American ambassador-at-large, was present, with an open mind and ready to present the views of President Roosevelt. It was understood he would urge an accord emphasizing supervision of arms and a more rigid control of the international traffic in arms.

Louis Barthou, foreign minister of France, showed no inclination to yield to the German demands for rearmament. The French are said to believe Hitler is due soon to run up against domestic troubles that will tie his hands; they will continue to promote their defensive alliances until the German chancellor gives in, and just now are counting on a pact of mutual assistance with Russia and the little entente which will be signed if, as expected, Russia enters the League of Nations. The French also are hoping for an accord with Italy.

Premier Mussolini of Italy, in a speech before the chamber of deputies, said that disarmament talk was foolish and in so many words suggested that war was the only way out of the economic adversities that beset Italy and Europe generally.

THE Irish Free State took another step toward becoming a republic when the dail eireann passed a bill abolishing the senate. After this action had been taken President Eamon de Valera said: "We want England to get out. We do not want to have anything to do with Britain. If there is to be any form of association, it must be in the common interest of both. We must be the judges of whether it is to our advantage or not."



Eamon de Valera

No definite plan was mentioned, and none is expected to be put forward before March, 1935, when abolition of the senate will become effective. Until that date any action of the dail would have to have senate approval.

EXEMPTION of the service industries from some of the fair trade practices of NRA codes was authorized by President Roosevelt in an executive order. The exemption does not apply to minimum wages and maximum working hours, child labor or collective bargaining. The order empowers Administrator Johnson to cease attempting to enforce open price systems, price fixing and other devices on hundreds of thousands of cleaners, dyers and pressers, barber shops, beauty shops and the like.

Mr. Roosevelt in his statement said that "a trial period of some months has shown that, while most industries, after organization for this work and a little experience with it, can secure uniform national results, there are others in which a greater degree of autonomous local self-government is desirable." Among these are "some but not all" of the service industries, the statement added.

Enforcement of the cleaners and dyers' code has been especially troublesome, accounting for more than half of the blue eagle removals.

Under the executive order, fair trade practice provisions for a service industry in a given area may be provided when 85 per cent of the industry in the area agrees to them and they are approved by the NRA.

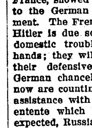
IN A report to the President the durable goods industries committee uttered a warning against further increases in wages and reductions in work hours, asserting it would retard recovery. The committee also said that federal control and imposition of penalties upon business men and bankers would have the effect of making them fear unjustified nuisance lawsuits as likely to hold them up to unfounded classification with fraud manipulators. This must only have the effect of obstructing needed financing, it stated.

Creation of confidence is the most important thing requisite to recovery, the committee told the President.

The securities act of 1933 and the Fletcher-Rayburn stock exchange regulation bill were specifically named by the committee as actual and potential deterrents to economic recovery.

ADMINISTRATOR JOHNSON was warned by officials of the United Textile Workers of America that there would be a general strike of 300,000 textile workers if the NRA order reducing cotton textile production by 25 per cent were put into effect. Johnson told them the order was amply supported by statistical data and would not be changed.

SENATOR ROBINSON, majority leader, heard rumors that some senators were planning a filibuster for the purpose of killing the administration's tariff bargaining bill. He said he was ready to squelch any such scheme by prolonging the daily sessions of the senate. "If that is the intention we will meet at 10 a. m. and stay until 8 p. m.," he said. "And, if that doesn't work, we'll come here at 9 a. m. and stay till the same hour in the evening."



Sen. Robinson

The house, after two days of work, passed the administration's industry loan bill and sent it back to the senate. The senate had approved a bill fixing the maximum total RFC five-year loans at $250,000,000 and limiting the amount the twelve federal reserve banks could advance to $280,000,000.

But the house discarded the senate provisions and inserted its own, which increase the RFC total to $300,000,000 and cut the reserve bank maximum to $140,000,000. The differences were to be adjusted in conference.

SENATE and house conferees reached an agreement on the stock exchange regulation bill. Under its terms the regulation will be concentrated in a new agency to be known as the "securities and exchange commission," consisting of five members to be appointed by the President. This provision was a part of the senate bill.

The conferees agreed to the house limitation on marginal trading, which would put control of credit for this type of market operations in the hands of the federal reserve board, but under the additional stipulation that marginal traders be required to carry 45 per cent of the value of any security traded in.

CODOS and Rossi, French flyers who hold the distance record, sought to better their mark by making a nonstop flight from Paris to California. They got across the Atlantic ocean all right, but a weakness of one wing of their big monoplane developed and they were forced to land at Floyd Bennett field, New York.

FOR the third time a native-born citizen of the United States has won the British amateur golf championship. The victor in the tournament at Prestwick, Scotland, was W. Lawson Little of California, a twenty-three-year-old student in Stanford university. In the finals Little swamped Jimmy Wallace, a Scottish carpenter, by the record-breaking score of 14 up and 13 to play. And this wasn't the only record he set. He did not lose one hole in the twenty-three played in the finals, and he made those holes in ten under fours, with ten under an average of two putts to the green. His score of the entire championship of six days was exactly an average of fours.

BARNEY ROSS of Chicago won the welterweight championship of the world when he defeated Jimmy McLarnin in a 15-round battle at New York. Barney already held the lightweight and junior welterweight titles.

Dishes That "Go" Together

Variety of Combinations Apparently Are Just Meant to Complement; May Be Said to "Flatter" Each Other When So Served.

To enjoy the edible good things of life is one of the prerogatives of the epicure. What comprises these good things depends upon the taste of the person or of the family, and preferences. The real epicure is the person whose taste has had a high degree of education in foods. He knows how to discriminate in edibles, both as to quality and to combinations. I well remember hearing a Chinese gentleman of discernment say of one vegetable that "it flatters the meat." The homemaker who sets a good table learns what to serve so that one dish may "flatter" another. Let us mention, today, some dishes which "flatter" each other.

Cranberry sauce flatters chicken, caper sauce does the same to mutton, and apple sauce does to roast pork, duck and goose. Cabbage flatters boiled corn beef, baked macaroni and cheese do the same to roast beef, and in England Yorkshire pudding is the accepted accompaniment to beef. In Europe a salad is correct with chicken, goose, and other roast birds.

To Europeans a salad signifies dressed lettuce or other salad greens with, possibly, the addition of a little chopped beet root or tomato slices. Other salads they have, but these have especial descriptive designations. Salad, as an accompaniment to flatter roast birds, is plain unless otherwise specified. The salad is served with the birds as naturally and regularly as are potatoes or other vegetables.

Turnip is a recognized accompaniment of corned beef. It is also excellent with lamb. Sweet potatoes are preferable to white with ham. Pineapple flatters ham. In India ripe pineapple slices are put on top of a slice of ham which is then baked, or cooked in a similar way. The juice extracted by the heat percolates through the meat, giving it a delicious flavor. Ham so cooked is reputed to be especially digestible.

Whipped cream flatters many desserts which are complete without this dainty addition. It goes with cold desserts especially, even topping some ice creams. Meringue belongs in the same class with whipped cream. It can be used interchangeably in many instances, although since it is more tasty when delicately browned, it belongs peculiarly to baked and even hot dishes. When on frozen desserts a hot iron is held above the piled meringue so that it, alone, gets the force of the intense heat. Ices with browned meringue tops are epicurean dishes.

A food which flatters another must be something apart from the dish itself. That is, it may be a separate food served as a complement to it, or it may be an addition to a dish itself which, however, could be served without it.

FINE WORK DONE BY 4-H MEMBERS IN ALL SECTIONS

Nearly a million American boys and girls were enrolled in the 4-H clubs during 1932. The number is over 900,000.

These boys and girls specialize in various farm activities. A 4-H boy, for example, raises blooded pigs. Another raises pure-bred calves. Another grows alfalfa or other field crops.

The girls practice household work. They study how to bake the best bread or the best pies. They vie in seeking to do the best sewing, the best fancy work, how to make the home beautiful and how to keep the costs of the home at the lowest level. Under club instruction many a girl has won a prize for the best chickens, the best calf or the best pig.

It is a work that teaches boys and girls the science and the better methods in farm life. It leads them on to splendid endeavor, to extraordinary efficiency in farm production and in solving farm problems. It creates in them an ambition to win the prizes offered in the various activities set up in the different states. It is raising up a new and skilled generation on the farms. It makes the farm and farm work attractive to the boys and girls, who have been running away from the old homestead to become hired men and hired girls in the overcrowded cities.

In the history of this world the sure guarantee of permanent government is a contented farm population. Home-owning farmers are the sure defense of freedom. The best bulwark against Communism is the farm home. It was the embattled farmers in the colonies who threw off the British yoke. A nation whose farmers go through the training of the 4-H has an impregnable defense against revolution and revolutionists. The million American boys and girls in the 4-H work in 1932 and the millions of former 4-H boys and girls now grown up and on American farms are America's rock of safety, the cream of American population.—Portland (Ore.) Journal.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
© The Safety Man

Saturdays and Sundays take the lead in the number of accidents by automobiles.

One hundred and thirty thousand accidents were reported on Saturdays of 1933 and one hundred and twenty-seven thousand on Sundays of the same year.

The week end congestion of traffic, especially on highways and on crowded city streets, is responsible for this record. People are anxious to get out of the city on Saturday and in their hurry to do this frequently forget the safe practices and common sense rules. In their endeavor to return again on Sunday night carelessness overtakes them and as a result more accidents are reported.

It is a fine thing to have week end picnics and outings and camping parties. Let us not mar these by being careless in our driving habits but let us pay special attention to the rules of the road and continue to enjoy these week end parties.

Remember, you are not a good driver unless you are a safe driver!

Post office officials of Scotland have ruled that cables of felicitation sent to newly married couples in colonies must be charged at full commercial rates, while those bearing other greetings go at reduced tolls.

Personality

Personality is not all in giving the qualities one has to the world, but rests a great deal in its ability to respond and be interested in the other fellow's problem. The person who has sympathy and understanding cannot help but be a gracious kindly soul with charm and warmth that we call personality.

Electricity

No one knows just what electricity is. A general definition is that electricity is a material agency which, when in motion, exhibits magnetic, chemical and thermal effects and which, when at rest or in motion [illegible], is of such a nature that when it is present in two or more localities within certain limits of association a mutual interaction of force between such localities is observed. Investigations indicate that it is discrete or granular in nature and that there may be two kinds, positive and negative.

Daniel and Noah Webster

The relationship between Daniel Webster and Noah Webster, if any, has never been established. Records show that Daniel Webster, the statesman and orator, was born at Salisbury, N. H., January 18, 1782, and was descended from Thomas Webster who first appeared in Watertown, Mass., in 1636, and that Noah Webster, of dictionary fame, was born in Hartford, Conn., October 16, 1758, and was descended from John Webster, one of the first settlers at Hartford, in 1636. But there is no known relationship between the two.

Saturdays and Sundays take the lead in the number of accidents by automobiles.

One hundred and thirty thousand accidents were reported on Saturdays of 1933 and one hundred and twenty-seven thousand on Sundays of the same year.

The week end congestion of traffic, especially on highways and on crowded city streets, is responsible for this record. People are anxious to get out of the city on Saturday and in their hurry to do this frequently, forget the safe practices and common sense rules. In their endeavor to return again on Sunday night carelessness overtakes them and as a result more accidents are reported.

County to Have Expert Canning Demonstration

Did you know—

That in preparing asparagus for canning, the dirt imbedded under the scales can be easily released if the stalks are plunged tip down into hot water?

That old jar rubbers are not safe for this year's canning?

That blanching and cold-dipping belong to the war days of 1918 and that the correct method is to pre-cook and pack the vegetables hot?

That soft water is better than hard water for canning peas?

These are just a few of the hundreds of hints on canning methods and discoveries to be given at the canning demonstrations to be held over the county during the next few days.

The demonstrations will be in charge of the local leaders under the auspices of the county emergency relief committee and conducted by Miss Miller, nutritionist and canning expert of the state ERA's social service division.

The demonstrations will take up all phases of the canning and proper preservation of vegetables, fruits, and meats, and will deal practically with new methods that prevent the waste of spoilage and eliminate the dangers of poisonous bacteria.

A part of the state emergency relief administration's garden and self-help program, these canning demonstrations will bring to all interested housewives the best information available on the subject of food preservation.

The demonstrations are for the benefit not only of relief clients but for every housewife in the county.

The canning program is directed by Miss Inez Hobart, nutritionist of the Farm School and now attached to the social service division of the state ERA, and is designed to make possible the best use of garden produce raised by relief clients.

"Although vegetables fresh from the garden will be used liberally throughout the summer, the majority will be canned for fall and winter use to supply the diet with more generous amounts of valuable minerals and vitamins than can be obtained on a restricted relief budget," said Miss Hobart.

Estimates of the value of a garden-canning program come to approximately five dollars per month for each person participating, according to the results of last year's experiment. Each family canned an average of $68.00 worth of produce from their gardens.

"Every housewife in the county, whether she has a garden or not, can save many dollars by attending her local canning demonstration."

The demonstration for this community will be held at the Woodman Hall, Middle River, from 10 a. m. to 3:30 p. m. on Monday, June 25. Bring a picnic lunch.

Petty Thievery

Some light fingered fellows pulled some more of their night robberies here Tuesday evening. H. N. Nubson who keeps his car near the Gunheim store where he has a room, lost a spare wheel and tire for his model A Ford. Hilmer Udstrand reports that he lost a wheel and aire of his Model T Ford when they broke open his garage and ransacked the works.

The same night some one paid a visit to the Hans Fosholm farm and took all but fourteen of their chickens. According to the report they lost about sixty birds

He Was A Little Upset

A party from Gatzke overturned their Chev. car on the highway near the Hj. Peterson home Saturday evening. None of the occupants of the car was hurt, but the car was badly damaged, as it rolled over two times and uprighted in the ditch. Wet pavement was the cause of the accident, said the driver.

Frank Hoffman is sporting a new chev.

Mr. and Mrs. Gust Williams and family of Greenbush spent Sunday here visiting with relatives.

You will have to hurry if you are planning on to get in on some of the doings that are to be held soon. Next Sunday you can rest. The following Sunday will be the day of the big picnic at Thief River Falls and then comes the 4th of July and the county fair. So step lively.

In the state and congressional races, it appeared, according to yesterday morning's papers, that R. T. Buckler (F-L) and Martin Oscar Brandon (Dem) were nominated for Congress from the 9th District. For Judges of District Court, 14th Judicial Dist., M. A. Brattland, James E. Montague, Martin O'Brien, and W. E. Rowe were apparently nominated, receiving most votes in the order named.

Shipstead was nominated on the Farmer-Labor ticket for Senator, winning out over Francis Shoemaker. The Democrats nominated Einar Hoidale, and Republicans, N. J. Holmberg, for the same post.

For Associate Justices of the Minnesota Supreme Court, Clifford Hilton, Julius Olson, William A. Anderson, and William H. Vanderburgh received pluralities in the order named.

There were 70 votes cast in the village of Holt out of a possible 85. Holt township cast 100 votes, and Excell cast 160 out of a possible 180, the heaviest vote ever cast in Excell.

Levi Johnson polled the biggest individual vote in the county receiving 3529 votes; Bordewich came second, with 2905.

Minn. Road Construction To Be Cut One-Half

There will be just one-half as much state highway construction in Minnesota next season as there has been this year, according to a bulletin from the highway department.

This will be the effect of the highway aid bill passed by congress last week. After 1935, under the terms of the bill, it may be impossible for Minnesota to obtain any substantial federal aid, which would mean virtually abandonment of state road construction activities in Minnesota.

"For the current fical years," said N. W. Elsberg, highway commissioner, "Minnesota had $10,600,000 of Federal road funds for construction. Under the new highway act, this will be cut to about $5,000,000 for the coming year, a reduction of 50 per cent.

"In 1936 the bill provides about $3,000,000 of Federal aid for Minnesota provided we can match it with an equal amount of state funds for construction purposes. The same provision is made for 1937. However, it now appears that it will be impossible for Minnesota to match the Federal funds in either 1936 or 1937, owing to the 65 per cent increase in trunk mileage and the 42 per cent decrease in automobile license fees made by the 1933 legislature. Practically all state revenues at present are required to meet the increased maintenance expense, bond charges and other necessary items."

Marshall County Fair to Present Many Attractions

Continuing its policy of giving the people of Marshall county the greatest amount of entertainment and education possible, preparations are being completed for the 28th annual Marshall County Fair to be held at the fair grounds at Warren on July 5, 6, and 7, Wm. Forsberg, president, announced today.

The 1934 edition of the county's own institution will surpass all previous fairs in entertainment features, while inquiries from all over the county indicate exhibit space will be taxed so greatly that it may be necessary to install temporary display quarters, said J. A. Grindeland, veteran secretary of the organization.

Vacations are now at hand and children will be free and full of enthusiasm and pep to enjoy games and play.

All boys and girls need to play in the fresh air. Play helps them to develop healthy minds and bodies. It is dangerous, however, to play in the streets. More children are hurt through playing in streets than from any other cause.

Drivers are not always at fault for accidents to children and there are many cases where children themselves have run against automobiles.

Communities should provide playgrounds and places to play for children. It is the duty of parents to caution and warn their children to only play on playgrounds instead of streets.

Children who play on safe grounds learn faster and play games better than children who play in the streets.

Find a safe place to play.

The Reason Why - -

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

Famous Cathedrals in South American Cities

The Columbus cathedral in Havana was one of the numerous resting places of Christopher Columbus, whose bones were finally taken to Seville after the Spanish-American war. The cathedral is Latin-Gothic in design and contains several notable paintings, but it is especially famous for its costly silver altar.

The cathedral at Port au Spain, Trinidad, is unusually rich in art treasures, with many valuable paintings and stained glass windows and a magnificent altar imported from Florence. The garden behind the church contains a statue of "Cristoforo Colombo, discoverer of the island."

In Rio de Janeiro the old imperial chapel serves as a cathedral. Here, too, is an interesting church in the heart of the business district, the Candelaria, reminiscent of Trinity or St. Patrick's in New York.

Buenos Aires has its cathedral on one of the most magnificent squares in the world, the Plaza de Mayo. Two paintings in the beautiful Church of San Francisco, also in Buenos Aires, are ascribed to Michelangelo. The Irish have their own church at Holy Cross, and the Church of Santo Domingo, built in 1806, displays many battle scars from various South American wars and revolutions.

Pure Natural Mineral Water May Help

MILLIONS FIND IT VERY BENEFICIAL

For over 2,000 years the great mineral waters of the World, given to us by Mother Nature, have proven themselves very beneficial in the treatment of "rheumatic" aches and pains, arthritis, sluggishness, certain stomach disorders and other chronic ailments.

It has been estimated that Americans alone have spent $100,000,000 a year in going to the mineral wells and health resorts of Europe. Over $1,000,000 of these foreign mineral waters are imported annually into this country to help suffering humanity.

But it isn't necessary to go to Europe to find fine natural mineral water. We have many marvelous mineral waters in our own country—many excellent health resorts to which you can go for the mineral water treatment for "rheumatic" aches and pains.

Most surprising of all, however, is the fact that today you can make a natural mineral water in your own home at a tremendous saving in expense. For Crazy Water Crystals bring you, in crystal form, healthful minerals taken from one of the world's fine mineral waters. Just the natural minerals. Nothing is added.

All you do is add Crazy Water Crystals to your drinking water, and you have a great mineral water that has helped millions to better health and greater happiness.

A standard size box of Crazy Water Crystals costs only $1.50 and is sufficient for several weeks thorough treatment for rheumatic pains. Crazy Water Co., Mineral Wells, Texas.

The old fellow described the smoke and country as best he could. He brought a chair for her to sit in because she would not leave the doorway. He tried to quiet her when she became frantic as he described the way the smoke rolled higher and spread across the upper end of the lake.

"Are you telling me the truth, Tim?" she asked repeatedly and the man swore that he was.

"Oh, for eyes!" she cried. "If I'd stayed in Chicago the bandage was to have been taken off tomorrow. The doctor insisted I must not take it off while I was away from him. So you must tell me, Tim, and tell everything. I'm depending on you, so!"

After a time, as her agitation only increased, Tim attempted to take her mind at least partially from the fire. He talked of her errand, of the salvation for the job that acquirement of the Laird's timber meant.

"Oh, the brief case!" she said. "Where is it? Mac said he would put it in the safe."

"And we will, too, Katie!"

Tim put the money away and went on talking, trying to keep her interested in things of a more reassuring nature than the fire.

At noon they were still in the doorway of the store, with Kate showing signs of the physical strain she was under.

"Better come to my shanty 'nd lay down a while," the man said solicitously.

She protested at first but Tim continued to insist that she rest and finally his way prevailed. Slowly he led her across to his one-room cabin, twenty rods from the store. She lay down on his bed and turned her bandaged face toward the wall. He stood there watching as long sobs commenced to rack her body and then busied himself preparing a lunch.

While he puttered about his stove a man emerged from the timber on the opposite side of the lake and stood looking across the neck of water towards the buildings. His brows were gathered and he waited as one will whose first objective is to be certain that when he moves it will be in the proper direction.

After she had rested and eaten, Kate Flynn sat on Tim's doorstep and once more the old fellow functioned as eyes for her.

"Hotter 'n hot but she don't spread. That means th' backfire's holdin'," he said over and over.

Across the lake the man had ceased his prolonged smoking. He walked slowly back and forth behind the screening bushes and impatience rode him severely.

Afternoon waned and once he cursed softly. He had gone further in his pacing, that time, and when he halted and looked across the water Tim Todd's shanty was hidden from him by the store building. Then he nodded sharply in decision and hastened through the brush to where a canoe and pack were cached. He launched and took the few strokes necessary to send him across the intervening water.

Then, very cautiously, looking all about and with one long stare up the lake toward where all the available man power of Good-Bye battled the flames he had set, ran across the sand toward the store.

The lowering sun was reflected dazzlingly from windows in the side of the building. He approached one, put his face close and stared within. The place was empty and he smiled. This was a safe way; to use the door would be at the risk of revealing himself to Tim. Slowly he shoved the window open, careful to make no sound, placed his hands on the sill and vaulted within. A moment later he was passing quickly around the end of the counter and dropping to his knees before the safe. . . .

Tim Todd had been talking constantly to Kate for the last half hour. The girl clung tightly to his gnarled hand.

"Looks better all th' time, Katie," he insisted. "I'd like to bet they stopped her at Otter creek, though how they'd do it in slash like that 'nd on a day like this—"

He broke short as his gaze chanced to wander to the store. Through a window on the near side he saw a man clambering through a window in the other!

"I'll be dusted!" he muttered, dropping the girl's hand and rising. "How come that-a-way?"

"What, Tim? What's happened?"

Kate rose, freshly alarmed at his tone.

"Just somebody at th' store, Katie. Likely they'll need somethin'. I'll skip over."

He did not skip. He hobbled as rapidly as he could along the pathway, his old heart thumping in alarm. Twenty-five thousand dollars reposed in the old cheese-box of a safe and some man had just entered the building with stealth.

He tiptoed up the steps and poised, looking within at Franz, kneeling before the safe. Franz had inserted the point of a wrecking bar behind the inner door. He strained against it as Tim halted; with a grating and a tinkle the lock gave, the door swung open and the brief case dropped from the shelf on which it had been placed.

"Here, you, Franz! What 're you-a-doin'?"

The words brought Franz to his feet, an odd sound in his throat.

They faced one another for an interval of strained silence. Franz was trapped, caught red-handed. He accepted the situation resolutely.

"You'd better clear out, Tim," he said darkly, snatching up the brief case. "I'm on my way. Right now!"

"You're a danged thief!" Tim cried.

"Shut up and get out!" Franz snarled, walking toward him.

"Get out, be dusted! I'm in charge here! I'm responsible for what's in here. Franz, you drop that satchel!"

He lurched inside and snatched up an ax which leaned against the wall.

The younger man halted, balked by this show of resolution.

"Put down that ax, you old fool! I'm caught, fair enough, and I've got to go through with it, now. You can't stop me."

"Oh, I can't, eh? Can't stop ye, can't I? Well, we'll see 'bout—"

And quickly, stoutly, he swung his ax as though he were striking at a tree, driving squarely for Franz's shoulder.

The other leaped backward; the bit buried itself deeply in the floor and as Tim wrenched it free Franz leaped the counter and made for the window through which he had entered.

"No ye don't!" Tim screeched and lunged after him, swinging the ax again. "No ye don't! Ye can't come it over me, Franz! Back into that corner, young man! I'll split ye in two if ye try to git away, now!"

Slowly but surely Franz was being cornered. The double bit swung in wide arcs as Tim advanced step by step.

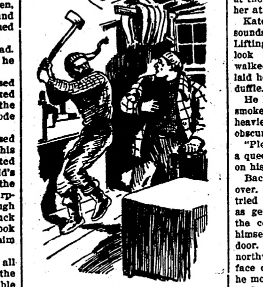
Franz's face lost color.

"Get out, old man!" he cried finally. "Get out or . . ." And then Tim was looking down the muzzle of an automatic pistol.

"Yah!" he jeered. "Ye can't scare me with no pop gun! Ye drop that or I'll chop yer hand—"

"Stay back!" Franz gasped, coming up against the safe and then the automatic spat just once, orange flame darted from the barrel.

The ax lost its firm swoop of direction. It sagged and drooped and dropped, bouncing and sliding to the far side as Tim, with a low whimper, raised both hands as if they were great weights, to his pierced breast.



"Oh, I Can't Eh? Can't Stop Ye, Can't I? Well, We'll See 'Bout—"

"Shot me!" he gasped in amazement. "Dusted if . . . ye didn't. . . ."

His knees gave. He went down slowly, wilting rather than falling, slumped to one hip and then sprawled shuddering on the floor. . . .

From the doorway of the little cabin Kate Flynn had heard. She heard Tim shout; heard another voice giving answer and the tones of the exchange stirred her to action. She groped her way into the beaten path as voices raised higher, as feet thudded, as the ax crashed and smashed. Her hands were extended before her and she called out repeatedly to Tim.

Then, nearing the store, she heard Franz's final warning and Todd's gallant defiance. Lastly, the venomous spat of the pistol.

With that, the girl ceased groping. Her hands whipped to her temples, fingers fastened in the white gauze of the bandage and with a jerk she pulled it from her eyes.

Sharp pains tore to the back of her head. She puckered her lids against the assault of light and wrinkled her face against the sudden torture. But she could see, and that was all that really mattered.

She stumbled forward those last few steps, knees weak with misgiving and when Franz, pistol in one hand, brief case in the other, stepped over the prostrate form of the old man he came face to face with her.

A low breath, half moan, half inarticulate curse slipped from the man. Kate, a hand on the door jamb, swayed backward, sick, as her eyes though throbbing and aching, transmitted to her understanding what had happened.

"You . . ." she moaned. "You shot him! You killed him! You'll answer for it! I heard everything! I was just outside!"

For an instant Franz stared at her. Then an odd smile crossed his face, he shoved the pistol into its holster against his side and he wet his lips.

"Yes, you heard. But, you see, you are here alone," he said simply and the quality of his tone was ominous.

"And with you gone? What then? Who would know?"

Behind him Tim Todd closed one hand. From his chest a dark stain was spreading on the floor boards.

"You mean, you'd shoot me down, too? Because I know?"

Franz laughed mockingly, and tucked the brief case under one arm.

"No," he said, and stepped closer. "It isn't pleasant business, I've discovered." A slight shudder traveled his big body. "I wouldn't harm a hair of your head, Kate . . . unless it became necessary." He licked his lips again; the lights in his eyes were shifting and changing as he planned a way out for himself. "I didn't intend to steal; I didn't want to kill. I wanted to block your deal with MacDonald, only, but"—with a shrug—"things broke badly. With the breaks going against you, you do the best you can. So, with you, there are things to be done."

"What things?" she whispered, alarmed for her own safety, now.

"You are alone. When you go, there will be none to know what happened."

"No, no! You can't do that!"

"I can't? Ha!" He snuggled the brief case closer against his side. "What's in here, and liberty, are all I have left." He caught her hand as she started to turn away. "I can use them both, seeing that they're all I own.

"We'll start, now; just you and I. We'll be together long enough so I'll be sure I've a start. And then . . . we'll cross that bridge when we reach it."

She commenced to struggle in his grasp, twisting her arm to free it, kicking out with her small feet. But her efforts were futile. Franz dropped the brief case, turned her roughly about, pulled her hands together behind her and bound them securely.

"Oh, help!" she screamed. "Help, Hel—"

His palm cut off her words.

"No one near," he reminded her. "However, there might be a little later. We will take no chances."

The bandage she had torn from her eyes hung loosely about her neck. He put one arm about her head, drawing it tightly against his breast, and with quick movements slipped the gauze across her lips, twisted a knot at the nape of her neck and then held her at arm's length, bound and gagged.

Kate made inarticulate, raging sounds, but he paid them no heed. Lifting her in his arms, with only one look behind at old Tim's form, he walked quickly out to his canoe, and laid her gently in the bottom with the duffle.

He headed up the lake to where the smoke shroud, now hanging low in the heavier air of approaching evening, obscured all landmarks.

"Pleasant journey!" he taunted, but a queer and foreboding hunger showed on his face as he stared at her.

Back in the store old Tim had rolled over. He tried to rise and could not; tried to crawl and could not so much as get his knees up. So, slowly, at the cost of infinite pain, he hitched himself along half-way to the open door. He saw the canoe making northward; he tried to call out. His face dropped again to the planks and he moaned twice and was still.

Steve Drake stood aside as the other men clustered about Young Jim Flynn, the men he had saved from probable death and the others whose hearts he had won by that achievement.

LaFane approached him, that grim smile playing about his lips.

"Broken, would you say?"

"Lord, no! Made!" Steve replied. "He's got the boys with him from the start!"

"And he'll keep 'em. He's wound on grand stuff. No need of your fearing to let 'em know who you are, now."

Drake experienced an odd let-down on this. The Polaris property was safe, with Kate's arrival; Young Jim was finally on the job, capable, competent and his courage had been spectacularly demonstrated. There was no longer any reason for him to use another's name; no longer cause to be reluctant to reveal to Kate Flynn the facts of his pretense. The twin goals for which he had struggled seemed to have been attained.

He drew a slow breath as he thought of the girl. She was more lovely than he had believed. The feel of her lips had stirred in him all manner of incredible impulses. The impression of a girl which he had built up for himself in those past weeks was a feeble thing compared to her reality.

Evening was at hand. The fire was under control. Already Wartin was preparing for the night's work. Steve beckoned to him.

"You told me where she started. Got any idea how?"

The man pursed his lips and shook his head.

"Must be a bug fire."

"What makes you think that?"

"Well, she come up over on the southwest of twenty-four. We've had no men over there all summer. There ain't any berries in that country so there wouldn't be any Injuns there lookin' for fruit. Nobody would be going through that particular country gettin' from one river to the other because there's better ways."

"Who'd have a reason? That we know, I mean?"

"Don't be dumb, Jimmy."

"I try not to be. Or to be going off half-cocked, either. What's in your head?"

FOODS ESSENTIAL

James was having a hard time centering his attention on the discussion of carbohydrates, proteins, and fats. Noting the lack of attention, the teacher asked: "James, what three foods are essential to man's physical welfare?"

"Breakfast, dinner and supper," answered the boy.

Not Her Worry

"But," said the friend who had dropped in from out of town, "won't your wife be sore at you for bringing me home to dinner without letting her know in advance?"

"Heck, no!" he replied, "I always pick up the makings for dinner at the delicatessen on the way home, and the kids and I get it on the table before she blows in from the bridge club."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

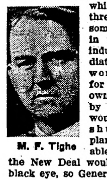
Johnson Averts Textile Strike and Tackles Steel Workers' Threat—Administration Moves for Relief of Drouth Sufferers.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

GENERAL JOHNSON, administrator of the NRA, evidently must be given credit for a skillful piece of work in negotiating the agreement which forestalled the threatened strike of some 400,000 workers in the cotton textile industry. The immediate peril was to the workers themselves, for the cotton mill owners, embarrassed by over-production, would be willing to shut down their plants for a considerable time. Of course, the New Deal would have suffered a black eye, so General Johnson tackled the problem energetically and persuaded Thomas F. McMahon, president of the United Textile Workers of America, and George Sloan, head of the Cotton Textile institute, to accept a compromise, and the call for the strike was revoked.



M. F. Tighe

The employers are permitted to go ahead with their program of curtailing production 25 per cent, and the laborers have the promise of an NRA investigation into the matter of higher wages and other points of difference. The union also is assured of increased representation on the industrial relations board of the cotton textile code authority and on the NRA advisory board.

The next great labor trouble, the dispute between the steel masters and the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers, promised to be more difficult for General Johnson to handle, and it seemed that prompt action by President Roosevelt would be necessary to avert the threatened strike. The men demand the right of collective bargaining through the union agents. Michael F. Tighe, president of the Amalgamated, declared it was up to Mr. Roosevelt to provide "prompt and unqualified enforcement of the law" on this point. He said the government had failed the steel workers and "their patience is exhausted."

According to the American Iron and Steel institute, the strike threats are due to the activities of union leaders who seek government intervention "to maneuver themselves into positions of power and domination over the steel workers of the nation." In a formal statement, the institute asserted relations of steel companies and a great mass of their employees are "peaceful," and that the whole difficulty lies with the Amalgamated association.

The "closed shop" is the one point at issue, the statement says, and for the employers to "accede to such a request would be rank treachery."

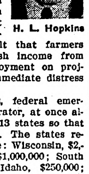
Asserting that an overwhelming majority of the 430,000 employees in the steel industry have refused to join the union and do not want to strike, the institute said:

"The opposition of the steel industry to the closed shop is fully warranted by its own experience and that of other industries, where there have been many instances of jurisdictional disputes, strikes, racketeering, excessive dues, fines, penalties, limitation of output, and intrusion of agents having no acquaintance with the industry or with the employees they claim as their constituents.

"No issue exists between the steel companies and the great majority of their employees. Since last June, more than 80,000 workers have been added to the payrolls. The eight-hour day has been generally adopted. Average hourly wages have increased 37 per cent, and they are now 7 per cent higher than they were at the peak in 1929.

"The steel industry believes its employees generally will resist all efforts to force them under closed shop domination."

ROUSED to action by the drouth, which is the worst the country has ever experienced, President Roosevelt telephoned from Groton, Conn., to the federal relief administration, directing that a special relief work program be put into operation immediately in the middle western states. On his return to Washington he called a council of war to expand his plans and hear proposals from various government officials. It was stated by Mr. Roosevelt that farmers should be given cash income from work and also employment on projects so that their immediate distress might be alleviated.



H. L. Hopkins

Harry L. Hopkins, federal emergency relief administrator, at once allocated $6,500,000 to 13 states so that the work could start. The states receiving allotments are: Wisconsin, $2,100,000; Minnesota, $1,000,000; South Dakota, $1,050,000; Idaho, $250,000; Kansas, $200,000; Montana, $350,000; Nebraska, $270,000; New Mexico, $100,000; North Dakota, $500,000; Utah, $600,000; Wyoming, $150,000.

Work projects, Mr. Hopkins said, will be put speedily under way to employ the heads of farm families in need. The projects will include the development of additional water supply through digging wells and through impounding or diverting water from rivers and lakes.

Projects employing men and women in the canning of meat, fruits and vegetables also will be used to conserve food resources of the area and furnish cash income for the families. Road work, as well, will provide considerable emergency employment.

A congressional appropriation that may exceed $500,000,000 was the paramount proposal before the drought conference. Some congressmen felt $1,000,000,000 would be necessary.

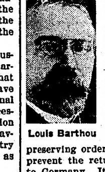
The picture presented to the conference was one of live stock emaciated for want of water and food, grasshoppers and chinch bugs doing untold damage in the wake of the heat and dryness, thousands of acres of planted grain lying ungerminated or blighted and hundreds of farm communities praying for rain.

Plans of live stock owners in the most seriously affected states to drive their cattle into Minnesota, North Dakota and Wisconsin for feeding and grazing were forestalled by the action of the governors of those three states forbidding the carrying out of the scheme. In Minnesota Governor Olson mobilized the National Guard to patrol the borders and enforce the embargo.

GREAT BRITAIN formally notified the United States that it would not pay anything on the war debt installment due June 15; that it would make no more payments until the United States consents to a downward revision of the debt, and that any discussion of revision at this time would be useless. All of which means plain default. The British note was sent in response to a blunt notification from President Roosevelt as to the sums due. It was evident, from foreign dispatches, that the other debtor nations, except Finland, would follow the course adopted by the British.

In his war debt message to congress the President said this country expected the debtor nations to pay unless satisfactory excuses could be offered, and he called attention to the vast sums those nations are expending on armaments. His plain language was not at all pleasing to the nations that owe us nearly twelve and one-half billion dollars.

LOUIS BARTHOU, foreign minister of France, appears as the dominating figure in the negotiations that may dispel the war clouds hanging over Europe. The most important thing he already has accomplished is the engineering of an accord between France and Germany on conditions for the Saar plebiscite and setting the date for that vote on January 13, 1935. The agreement gives assurance that France, under the pretext of preserving order, will not use force to prevent the return of the Saar basin to Germany. It also means that the Germans now have everything to lose and nothing to gain from a putsch in the Saar, so the possibility of a clash in the near future is virtually eliminated. Of special importance is a clause that amounts to recognition of the rights of Jewish and anti-Nazi minorities in the Saar.



Louis Barthou

In the disarmament conference in Geneva M. Barthou has been equally forceful though not so peaceful in his doings. He has stood out firmly against the German demands for arms equality and has greatly angered Sir John Simon, British foreign secretary. In connection with Counsellor Rosenberg of the Soviet embassy in Paris, Barthou has been forming what is called an eastern Locarno pact to be signed by Russia, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, with France as its moral guarantor. This would be rather a shock to Germany and Poland, and the Franco-Russian bloc thus formed would force Great Britain into the background in matters concerning continental Europe. To block this scheme the British would be glad to have the arms conference agree on a minimum program and then adjourn.

ALL opposition to administration measures for the remainder of the session was headed off in the house by the adoption of a gag rule which was pushed through by the Democratic leaders in a tumultuous session. The Republicans shouted and booed, and even used their fists, but to no avail, and so the way was cleared for final action by the representatives on the communications, municipal bankruptcy and deficiency bills. It was understood the senate, after disposing of the tariff bill, would agree to the conference report on the air mail measure and then almost certainly approve the silver bill.

Three Essentials in the Attainment of Old Age

"Our hospital records and the doctors' case files are bursting with information regarding the frailties and disintegration of old age, but only the life insurance records contain any great amount of reliable information regarding the normal conditions in extreme old age."

Thus Drs. Francis G. Benedict and Howard F. Root of the nutrition laboratory of the Carnegie institution in Washington introduced before the National academy a study of old age which they have made on the person of ninety-one-year-old Seth W. Lincoln of Worcester, a typesetter whose body and mind may well be envied by men half his age. Lincoln was tested just as if he were a piece of machinery—one that proved to be remarkably efficient. His heart, kidneys and arteries are those of a young man.

The specialty of Doctors Benedict and Root is metabolism—the conversion of food into tissue and energy. They measured Lincoln's basal metabolism, that is, his heat production, on an empty stomach in the morning while he was lying quietly. It was so low as to indicate senile debility and extreme muscular weakness. But Lincoln's quick movements, his active life, his strength belied any such conclusion. So Doctors Benedict and Root decided that "this man's body machine is working with extraordinary efficiency, and that when it is not performing muscular work it resembles an automobile engine while idling."

That this is probably the correct view is indicated by a comparison of Seth Lincoln with Sir James Crichton-Browne (eighty-nine) and the late Dr. W. W. Keen of Philadelphia, who died at ninety-five. Their oxygen consumption—which is what is actually measured in a basal metabolism test—was also low, though not quite so low as that of Lincoln.

The secret of Lincoln's longevity seems to be his ease of mind. He has passed through life unruffled by financial stress or great sorrow. This in the opinion of Doctors Benedict and Root "has relieved him of much of the excess tension and nerve-racking, wearing strain that come all through life to so many of our intense American business men."

How, then, is long life to be attained? The essentials are sound ancestors, temperate habits of life and freedom from worry.—New York Herald Tribune.

"Stuffed" Ballot Box in English Parliament

If an old yarn is to be believed, the people of the world owe their privileges regarding habeas writs to an old trick of crooked politics. When the act of 1679 was going through the English parliament there was strong opposition in the house of lords. The third reading, according to one Bishop Burnet, was carried by a trick. Two members of the house of lords, Grey and Norris, were appointed tellers to count the vote.

A very fat member was counted as ten members by Lord Grey who, so the narrater says, did it at first as a joke. Then, seeing that Lord Norris, who was in bad health, did not notice what had happened, Grey, who favored the bill, went on with his misreckoning, which added enough extra votes to carry the bill.

"There must have been," wrote a famous English authority some years ago, "some mistake, accidental or willful, for the members were declared to be 57 to 55 for the bill and by the minute-book of the lords it appears that there were only 107 peers in the house."

HOLDS UNIVERSE TO BE RESULT OF EXPLODING ATOM

Once upon a time, some 10,000,000,000 years ago, a primordial atom, perhaps the size of an orange, exploded.

The resulting fireworks developed through the ages into suns and stars and nebulous groups of heavenly bodies which we call the universe.

That is the picture of creation painted by Abbe George Lemaitre, of the University of Louvain, Belgium, a profound mathematician, physicist and astronomer.

"In the beginning," he declared, "all matter in the universe existed in a small atom. That atom burst, similar to the manner in which radium explodes, and its fragments evolved into heavenly bodies.

"The universe still is expanding, and the day may come when we will all freeze to death. That, of course, may be billions of years from now."

The expanding universe, Abbe Lemaitre said, might be likened to a spotted balloon. As the balloon grows in shape, the spots on its surface spread farther apart

Thus the many galaxies of stars scattered throughout space are moving apart, just as their component parts are spreading Although the rate of movement is infinitesimal in our own small universe, the earth, too, is moving away from its central heating plant, the sun, Lemaitre believes

Then there is another argument, advanced by Dr Richard Tolman, mathematical physicist of California Institute of Technology

Doctor Tolman holds that the universe alternately expands and contracts, in cycles.

CHOOSE THE TIRE CHAMPIONS BUY

Firestone

Tires have been on the winning cars in the gruelling Indianapolis 500-Mile Race FOR 15 CONSECUTIVE YEARS

EVERY winner in the 500-Mile Indianapolis Race—the most gruelling tire test in the world—drove to victory on Firestone High Speed Tires.

Race drivers know that heat generated by friction inside the cotton cords is the greatest enemy of tire life. These men will not risk their lives on any but Firestone Tires, because they know the high stretch cords in every Firestone Tire are protected by the Firestone patented process of Gum-Dipping.

Gum-Dipping soaks the high stretch cords in liquid rubber and saturates and coats the millions of fibers inside the cords, counteracting destructive friction and heat. It provides greater adhesion between the plies of the tire, and between the Gum-Dipped cord body and the tread.

Firestone chemists and engineers kept pace with new car developments by building stronger, safer tires to meet the exacting demands. See your Firestone Dealer or Service Store today and equip your car with new Firestone High Speed Tires for 1934, with deeper, thicker, flatter, and wider non-skid tread, more and tougher rubber, more traction, giving you more than 50% longer non-skid mileage.

Remember, in Firestone High Speed Tires there is Greater Strength—Greater Safety—and Greater Blowout Protection than in any tire made.

THE ADHESION TEST

Note how the rubber in a Firestone Tire clings to the high stretch Gum-Dipped cords. This greater adhesion and strength is made possible by the Firestone patented process of Gum-Dipping.

Note how the rubber in an ordinary tire pulls away from the cords that have not been soaked and insulated with rubber. This causes friction and heat within the cords, resulting in separation.

THE NEW Firestone AIR BALLOON FOR 1934

The new Firestone Air Balloon for 1934 embodies all the improvements in the new Firestone High Speed Tire. The lower air pressure provides maximum traction and riding comfort. Gum-Dipping safety-locks the cords, providing 30 to 40% greater deflection and blowout protection.

Pairs and Pears

When the bride enters her new home she brings, tucked away in her mind, a little list of her husband's favorite dishes and a big resolve to serve them often. And nowadays there are not so many jokes about the bride's first biscuits and her husband's bravery in eating them for better or for worse. No longer needs the groom go home to Mother for a good square meal. The bride buys ready-made biscuits in a can and makes use of every modern device which helps her be a good cook—or seem so.

Pears for Happy Pairs

When she sits down to plan her menus for the day—some practical housewives prepare them for a week—she should frequently include pears. Exquisite in taste and extremely digestible, pears introduce pleasing variety into any of the three meals. When fresh pears are not in season, she can obtain them in cans, whole or in halves. And here are three delicious ways to use them.

Pear Desserts

Pear and Fig Pudding: Lay twelve fig crackers in the bottom of a baking dish, and arrange on top contents of one 8-ounce can of pears and one 8-ounce can of figs. Pour both fruit syrups over, and bake in a 375 degree oven, twenty-five to thirty minutes. Serve with cream. This serves six.

Meringued Pears: Drain and lay six halves of canned pears (about two-thirds of the contents of a No. 2 can) in a baking dish about two inches apart. Fill cavities with one tablespoon butter and one tablespoon sugar. Beat three egg whites stiff, add half a cup confectioner's sugar slowly, and continue beating. Add one teaspoon almond flavoring, and cover pears completely with the meringue. Bake in a slow—350 degree—oven for fifteen minutes or until a delicate brown. Serve hot or cold. This serves six.

A Pear Cup

A delightful fruit cup may be made of diced pears and strawberries with lime juice poured over them. The syrup from the pears may be tinted pale green if your Irish is up.*

Peas Are Green

The princess in the fairy tale established her claim to royal birth by being able to notice the presence of a single pea under a heap of mattresses piled on her bed. The modern pea-test is quite a different one. By making sure that peas are noticed on the menu, modern princesses establish their right to wear a culinary crown.

Peas Rank High

One of the first maxims of a queen of cookery is: "Peas are green; and the housewife is green who doesn't know that there are dozens of ways to make delectable dishes with them. Such as—

Curried Pea Omelet: Make an omelet as usual of three eggs, three tablespoons milk and half a teaspoon salt. Combine one tablespoon butter, one tablespoon flour, a quarter of a teaspoon salt, three-eighths of a teaspoon curry powder, and three-fourths of a cup milk to make a white sauce. Add three-fourths of a cup canned peas to the sauce, and pour it over the hot omelet just before folding it over onto the platter. This serves four. (In doubling quantity for eight persons, it is better to make two omelets than one large one of six eggs.)

Simple Pea Recipes

Peas with Fresh Tomatoes: Cut three or four not too soft tomatoes in pieces, and sauté them gently in three tablespoons butter until soft. Season well and add the contents of one No. 2 can of peas. Heat well. This serves eight.

Corn and Pea Succotash: Combine and heat one can of corn, two-thirds of a can of peas, two tablespoons of butter, salt and pepper to taste. This serves eight.

Asparagus and Peas on Toast: Look over and break a bunch of asparagus into short pieces. Boil in salted water, and drain. Heat contents of a can of peas, drain and season, and mix lightly with the asparagus. Pile on buttered toast and pour over melted butter or Hollandaise sauce.

A Good Pea Salad

Pea and Apple Salad: Marinate one cup of peas and one cup diced celery in French dressing for an hour. Add half a cup chopped nuts and two large diced apples. Mix with mayonnaise. This serves eight.*

Dog Wants to Be Boss

The sense of proprietorship is more strongly developed in the dog than in any other animal, an instinct reminiscent of the wolf's fierce resentment at interference with its prey. Your pet will thus be a much more efficient watch dog to leave in your car if you will give him an old coat or some other object to guard as his own when you leave him.

Inauguration Day on Sunday

Inauguration day has fallen on Sunday only four times since that date was fixed. It was Sunday for President Taylor in 1849, for President Hayes in 1877, for President Monroe in 1821, and for President Wilson in 1917. Had March 4 been retained for inaugurations, the next time it would have fallen on Sunday would been 1945.

1934 U. S. Potato Crop May Exceed That of 1933

Should conditions be normal for the remainder of the summer the United States potato crop probably will be somewhat larger than last year, according to L F. Garey of the division of agriculture economics, University Farm.

Mr. Gary's statement was prepared June 12. At that time, he said, "The only reports available on the potato crop are for the condition in 10 early potato states, plantings in the late states having been completed but a short time ago.

The dry weather has affected the crop in the states of Arkansas, Oklahoma and Texas, but the condition in the other early potato states is a little above normal. On the whole, the condition of the crop is about normal and somewhat better than a year ago.

In spite of the dry weather in the late potato states, potatoes have come up and recent rains have made the outlook hopeful. So much depends on weather conditions in August that it is impossible to tell at this time what the crops will be. If conditions should be normal for the remainder of the summer the potato crop should be somewhat larger than last year."

Big Auto Spill Saturday

Aother big auto spill took place near the Jim Peterson home Saturday morning at 4:30. Clifford Peterson of Roseau and Iver Johnson of Greenbush accompanied by two girls from Badger, were the occupants of the car, a Pontiac coupe, driven by Peterson of Roseau, when the accident happened.

It had just started to rain when they passed thru town and from the information we got, it appeared as if the driver stepped on the gas too hard when he hit the wet oil road as they were leaving here going north, with the result that his car got out of control when it skidded and he set the brakes so hard that the car summersaulted once, slid with the wheels in the air for about fifty feet in the road ditch, hit the ditch bank with the rear end which was on the lead all this time, and rolled over sideways twice and came to rest at a 45 degree angle among the shade trees in Jim Peterson's front yard.

All the occupants of the car were bruised up pretty bad and had to be rushed to Thief River Falls for treatments at a hospital. One of the girls had to stay there a few days.

The car, which was wrecked kind of much, was straightened out some and taken home in the evening.

Arno Steinhauer reported to us that he had a close call in losing his farm home at noon on Sunday when a flooded gasoline range set fire to to the kitchen. Fortunately he had a fire extinguisher at hand and was able to put out the fire before it gained much headway. Only small damage was done to the house.

The following were Sunday afternoon visitors at the Mrs. Fred Larson home: Mrs. Folker and Mrs. Maland of Larimore, Stanley Lysne, Mr. and Mrs. Ole Larson and family, Mr. and Mrs. Willie Sorum and family, Mr. and Mrs. Iver Larson and family, Mrs. Norman Peterson and children and Mr. and Mrs. Paul Olson.

Good Prospects in View for Large Crowd at County Fair

Generous rains materially brightening crop prospects in all parts of Marshall county together with a widespread feeling of satisfaction with programs during past years, indicate that large crowds will attend the 28th Annual Marshall County Fair at Warren on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, July 5, 6, and7 according to William Forsberg, president of the association.

With the people throughout the county awaiting the opening of the 1934 edition of the fair, and committees working hard to perfect all the details for the comfort of the people attending, everything will be ready for the large crowds expected.

Two big High School Bands, the Stephen high school and Warren high school organizations will provide music daily during the three day exposition. The prize winning Stephen band under the direction of Supt. A. C. Huselid, will play during Friday programs while the Warren band under the direction of K. Kiland will play Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon and evening. The organizations are cooperating heartily with the fair officials and have made possible their appearance.

Contracts were completed on Tuesday by Fair officials for the purchase of the Wigmam Dance Pavilion, located 16 miles east of Crookston and a crew of men and trucks will move the spacious dance building to the Marshall County Fair Grounds. This will give the people of Marshall county a permanent dance pavilion with a splendid dance floor. Al Duncan's celebrated Dance Band will supply the music all three evenings during the fair.

Fair officials again wish to remind the public of the big night show featuring Harry Pearl's Scandals of 1934, a musical revue of 26 people and an orchestra of 10 pieces. This big revue is one of the finest on the road and is being brought to Marshall County at considerable expense to give our people entertainment that as a rule, only large cities can enjoy. A complete change of program will be made each night.

Then during the afternoon programs some world famed artists will perform including the McKeone Troupe, Balzer Sisters, Marlo and LeFlores, Roberta's Animal Circus and on the midway — Claude Bremer's shows. The big program has been secured through Lew Rosenthal's Amusement Co., which organization has been responsible for the fine grandstand acts at the local fair during the past three years.

Horse and pony racing will again be welcome features at the afternoon programs. Friday afternoon's races will be open only to Marshall and Northern Polk county entries, while Saturday afternoon's races will be open to entries from the entire Red River Valley Better Fairs Circuit. Many entries have already been received indicating some exceptionally fast races.

The county's 4-H club members are putting their finishing touches to their projects this week, getting projects ready for display at the fair. Father and mother are also working hard to have their displays ready for exhibition.

Take it all in all, it will be a fair everyone should attend at least one day, and remember all children under 12 years of age will be admitted free when accompanied by adults.

We'll see you at the Fair at Warren next week.

Back from Southern Minn.

Wm. Mehrkens and daughters, Irene Holst and W. Rux returned home this week from near Goodhue, Minn., where they had visited with friends and relatives. Mr. Mehrkens stated that the farmers down there were buying new alfalfa hay at $23 a ton to feed their stock. They had to use all available meadow to pasture the cattle in order to keep them and from the way it looked if they did not get more rain soon, there would be no hay to put up down there.

On Trail Petty Thief

Sheriff Bordewich was called here last Thursday evening to help settle the matter as to who had stolen the tires and wheels that car owners around here lost last week. He did, however, get on the trail of Walter Nelson from Grand Forks, who had been around and who the sheriff was told had taken some of the property. This fellow was chased by car out in the country with the thot in mind of asking him about the matter, but he decided to abandon his car which the sheriff now holds, and skipped out. He was again picked up by men that the sheriff had along to hunt for him near Strathcona on Saturday but he broke away, resisting arrest. Several other items that farmers and others had missed lately were also found in the car which he left here.

The Reason Why - -

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

EASTERN BUYER GETS OLD BIBLE; LONG IN FAMILY

Part of it printed in 1634, the rest of it published in 1664, the "oldest family Bible in the United States" has been acquired by a Philadelphian.

He is Edward Applebach, and he bought the Bible from Mrs. E. A. Giffin, of Miami, Fla.

The Bible is that of the Kent family, and in addition to carrying all the books of the Old and New Testaments, it contains the Book of Common Prayer and other rituals used in the Church of England.

One William Headlam apparently was the Bible's first owner, for his name and the date 1670 appear on one page. Then follow a number of Kent family names and dates up to the 1870s.

The volume, printed in the main by "John Bill and Christopher Barker, printers to the King's most excellent Majesty," contains 1,400 pages, 1,152 of them used for the books of the Old and New Testaments.

Also contained within the Bible is the following prayer for the English royal family—

"Almighty God, the fountain of all goodness, we humbly beseech Thee to bless our gracious Queen Catherine, Mary the Queen Mother, James, the Duke of York, and all the royal family.

"Endow them with Thy holy spirit, enrich them with Thy heavenly grace, prosper them with happiness and bring them to Thine Everlasting kingdom, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

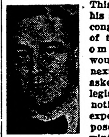
President Tells Congress His Further Plans for National Regeneration—Organized Business Enters a Protest—Fletcher Made G. O. P. Chairman.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

IMMEDIATE relief from distress and recovery of business prosperity fall far short of President Roosevelt's plans for regeneration of the nation. This was revealed in his special message to congress which told of the plans and recommendations he would submit to the next congress. He asked for no present legislation, but gave notice of the social experiments he proposes to begin next winter.



President Roosevelt

The message discussed the three factors of housing, land and resource planning and old age and unemployment insurance.

Expressing satisfaction over progress in relieving industry, agriculture, and unemployment, the President, asserting his right to chart social reforms, declared, "It is childish to speak of recovery first and reconstruction afterward."

Taking up the housing problem, he said millions of dollars had already been provided to improve living conditions, and voiced the hope that with passage of his housing program private capital would be stimulated to widen the scope of home building.

Discussing planned control of the land, he declared that hundreds of thousands of families now live "where there is no reasonable prospect of a living in the years to come."

Sounding the failure of the government thus far to create a "national policy" for the development of land and water resources, Mr. Roosevelt indicated his intention of providing such a policy, and for the transferring to new lands of "those people who cannot make a living in their present positions."

Outlining his views on providing security against unemployment and old age, Mr. Roosevelt said he was seeking a "sound means" which he could recommend to provide an immediate safeguard against these "hazards and vicissitudes of life."

WHEN President Roosevelt signed the tariff bargaining bill he acquired authority to negotiate reciprocal trade treaties without senate approval and to increase or decrease tariff rates by as much as 50 per cent in order to stimulate foreign commerce. This policy of swapping reductions, the government believes, will result in great benefit to our foreign trade, and at the same time will give adequate protection to industry. Already nearly thirty foreign nations are lined up, awaiting an opportunity to negotiate reciprocal treaties.

EVEN the Democrats in congress are not boasting openly of their success in passing the bill for a census of the unemployed, and many of them voted against it or were absent when it came up for final passage. That it was designed mainly to give jobs for the faithful at the expense of the national treasury was clear, for the census takers are not to get their jobs until after the November congressional elections. Then they will receive $2 a day for a long period, obtaining answers to an elaborate questionnaire. No one knows of what use this will be except to the Democratic congressmen who are seeking re-election, and to their henchmen.

CONGRESS completed action on the communications bill and it was handed to the President for his signature. This new law puts an end to the federal radio commission and creates a new board of seven members known as the federal communications commission that not only takes over the duties of the radio board but also all control that has been exercised by the interstate commerce commission over telegraphic and telephonic communications.

A significant new provision which the bill carries into law is the assertion of full control over all wire and radio communications by the government in case of war or "public peril." Under this section the President has authority to take over all wire and radio offices and stations with just compensation to persons entitled thereto.

ORGANIZED business of the United States insists that the balancing of the budget is an "imperative necessity," and fears that this may be upset by provisions in the deficiency appropriation bill carrying $1,172,000,000. These provisions permit the President to transfer Reconstruction Finance corporation funds to relief and public works purposes. The expenditures would thus be made outright instead of in reimbursable loans. Henry I. Harriman, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, wrote a letter to Senator Glass, chairman of the senate appropriations committee, urging that the senate limit the President's authority to shift loans.

Mr. Harriman said in part:

"Up to the present much of the RFC funds have been used for the purpose of making reimbursable loans. The government has consequently been accumulating assets which sooner or later can be liquidated and the money received turned into the treasury.

"It has been estimated that after the debt increase of $9,300,000,000 in 1934 and 1935, as contemplated in the budget message, the government would have about $5,000,000,000 of assets which could be realized upon to discharge debt.

"But under the bill the purpose for which RFC funds may be used is greatly extended. These contemplate nonreimbursable expenditures with no possible recompense to the treasury. It must also be recalled that, in addition to the large increase in the public debt, the government has acquired contingent liabilities to about $6,000,000,000."

HENRY P. FLETCHER of Pennsylvania has been handed the rather difficult job of managing the Republican party. The national committee at its session in Chicago elected him chairman to succeed Everett Sanders. This would seem to be a wise choice, for Mr. Fletcher is an able and energetic man notable for his diplomacy and tact and also for ready wit. In 1898 he abandoned law practice to become one of Theodore Roosevelt's Rough Riders, and after the campaign in Cuba he transferred to the infantry and served through the Philippine insurrection. He entered the diplomatic service in 1902 and after valuable service in Cuba, China, Portugal and again in China, he was successively ambassador to Chile, Mexico, Belgium and Italy. For a time during the Harding administration he was undersecretary of state, and after his retirement from the embassy in Rome he was chairman of the federal tariff commission.

H. P. Fletcher

The national committee adopted a statement of principles for the party in the fall campaign which in temperate but firm language condemned the doings of the Democratic administration, without any personalities, and more specifically set forth what the Republican party thinks should be done to restore the nation to prosperity. Opening with the statement that "American institutions and American civilization are in greater danger today than at any time since the foundation of the Republic," the statement plunged immediately into discussion of the need for social legislation.

There was assurance of liberal treatment of these problems in this paragraph:

"Our nation is beset with problems of infinite complexity—the problems of recovery; of unemployment, with its unending tale of human suffering; of agriculture, with its lost markets and relatively low prices; of forever checking abuses and excesses that have become all too apparent, and thereafter the problems of a wider spread of prosperity; of relieving the hardships of unemployment and old age, and of avoiding these tragic depressions. These problems must be approached in a broad, liberal and progressive spirit, unhampered by dead formulas or too obstinately clinging to the past."

Solution of the problems, however, said the statement, should be "within the framework of American institutions in accordance with the spirit and principles of the founders of the Republic."

Further on the platform said: "We are opposed to revolutionary change without popular mandate—and all 'change by usurpation,' the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed.

"We believe that the present emergency laws vesting dictatorial powers in the President must never be permitted to become a permanent part of our governmental system."

MUCH interesting information was given the special house committee that is investigating "un-American" activities in the United States, these being especially the activities of the Nazis. Facts and figures were presented showing officials of the German government had spent money for the dissemination of pro-German information in this country, the German ambassador, Dr. Hans Luther, and the German consul general in New York, Dr. Otto Kiep, both figuring in the testimony.

Dr. Hans Luther

Doctor Kiep was said to have paid $4,000 to a New York city publicity and business promotion firm to "obtain publicity in this country" of anti-Semitic statements. He was said, also, to have contributed, unofficially and in behalf of a third person, $300 in $50 bills for the publication of a pro-German pamphlet. Doctor Luther was described as the financial backer and sponsor of the pamphlet.

DROUTH-STRICKEN regions of the Middle West were blessed with soaking rains, and hope was held out for forage crops and corn. The earlier crops, however, are ruined over most of the area. Secretary Wallace, after a trip through the "dry" states, described the drouth as a "tragedy" for the farmers who are suffering from its ravages, but a possible future "blessing for the country as a whole."

ALL this year Maryland is celebrating the three hundredth anniversary of its founding in 1634; but the big event took place at St. Marys City, where Leonard Calvert, first governor of the province, and his colonizers landed. Replicas of the Ark and the Dove, Calvert's vessels, built to scale, sailed up the St. Marys river leading a gay water parade and anchored off the first Maryland capital, which has almost disappeared in the intervening years.

LARGELY through the efforts of Norman Davis, American ambassador at large, the European statesmen at Geneva were persuaded to drop their quarreling and adopt a mild compromise resolution that prolonged the life of the disarmament conference. Great Britain and France agreed upon a plan, based on the return of Germany to the conference, and the aid of Italy was enlisted. It was arranged that Chancellor Hitler should go to Venice and that Premier Mussolini should fly to that city to confer with his fellow dictator, whom he had never met. Later Louis Barthou, French foreign minister, is expected to go to Rome for a talk with Mussolini in which the misunderstandings between their countries may be ironed out.

Premier Mussolini

Mussolini and Hitler were to discuss European policies generally, and, specifically, the German claims to full armament and the Austrian question, involving Nazi propaganda in the latter country.

This Anglo-French compromise was a diplomatic setback for Russia, but the Soviet republic countered with the announcement that it had been recognized by Czechoslovakia and Rumania. Recognition by Jugoslavia was expected to follow shortly. Maxim Litvinov's announcement was taken to mean that the Russians intend to go ahead with their policy of encircling Germany.

German papers agree a new chapter in relations between Soviet Russia and the powers of southeastern Europe has been opened. It is expected the next step probably will be the conclusion of a commercial agreement between the little entente and Moscow, one of the purposes being to minimize the effect of Soviet dumping of lumber and cereals in the entente nations. Nonaggressions and mutual assistance pacts are said to be in the background.

RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, son of Winston Churchill, former British chancellor of the exchequer, obtained a most interesting interview from former Kaiser Wilhelm. The seventy-five year-old ex-emperor gave his approval to the Nazi regime and hinted that Hitler's work may be "crowned" by the restoration of the Hohenzollern monarchy. He did not say whether he himself sought reinstatement, declaring: "The German people have turned me out. If they want me back they will have to come and fetch me." Which the German people probably never will do.

"Hitler has done marvelous work in putting new life and soul into the German nation," the former Kaiser was quoted as declaring. "If ever they felt it right that his endeavors should be crowned by a return to a constitutional monarchy, I am sure that my family would not fail in their duty."

Wilhelm, his interviewer said, expressed contempt for "the talking circus at Geneva" and said the League of Nations "does nothing but bring international co-operation into ridicule."

SEVEN persons met a tragic death when an American Air Lines plane, flying from Newark to Buffalo, crashed in the Catskills, 12 miles north of Livingston Manor and was burned. The victims were H. H. Pinsley of New York, W. B. Eader, W. A. Cass and H. C. Coppins, all of Buffalo, passengers; Clyde Holbrook and John Barron, Jr., pilots, and Miss Margaret Huckeby, stewardess, all of Chicago.

NRA celebrated its first birthday at a dinner given by Administrator Johnson to the 85 original employees of the organization who were at work before the recovery act was passed. Besides stenographers and office boys, these included a number of big time business men.

General Johnson also invited Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins and Senator Robert F. Wagner.

CARRYING forward the program of arbitrary federal acreage control which began with passage of the Bankhead cotton bill, the house voted, 206 to 144, for passage of the so-called Kerr tobacco bill vesting the AAA with statutory power to force compliance with its adjustment program.

The measure was sent to the senate over protests of Republicans who denounced the plan as just another step toward regimentation of farming.

The house also completed legislative action on the reciprocal tariff bill and it was sent to the President for his signature.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

A very dilapidated old man presented himself at a hospital for dogs and cats and asked the porter to take him in.

"You can't come in here," said the porter brusquely.

"Oh, yes, I can," said the old fellow, "I'm an old soldier."

"But that don't make any difference," said the porter, "this is a veterinary hospital."

"That's right," said the old soldier serenely, "I'm a veteran."

"Well, you've just about cleaned up on Franz. When you got here he was sittin' in the golden chair. You've made a monkey out of him since. He ain't quit the country and he ain't the kind to forgive. If I was to want to nab the man who started this fire I'd begin right now checkin' up on where Mr. Franz esquire was at this forenoon."

A crawly premonition ran through Steve. Wartin thought just as he did. It was perfectly reasonable to suspect that Franz, outmaneuvered in more ambitions than the foreman knew anything about, would resort to the torch before accepting defeat.

And, on this, a companion fear commenced to form within him. The future of Polaris lay between the folds of a heavy brief case back there at headquarters, protected only by an old, crippled man and a temporarily blinded girl. This fact assumed ominous proportions although he tried to laugh at himself.

Why, Franz could not know that the money had arrived, he argued silently as Wartin talked on about plans for the night; but in the next breath he was remembering that the man had been present when MacDonald dictated his terms and would know that any representative of the Flynns arriving now would bring currency.

He called LaFane to one side.

"I'm dropping back to headquarters just to have a look," he said. "I'll take a canoe because Wartin may need the boats for supplies. Just tell Young Jim to sit tight until I get back. When the boys are told what we three know, we should all be together."

"Right."

Dusk was falling as Steve landed. A silence hung over headquarters which seemed weighted with import as he stepped to the sand. He stood still a moment, listening, and then called sharply:

"Hi, Tim! . . . You, Tim!"

No answer, and again a premonition of trouble went crawling along his spine. He called again; still no response.

He could see that the door of the store was open and, stopping only to take an electric flash-light from his jacket in the canoe, walked swiftly toward it.

"Tim!" he called sharply from the steps, that premonition more pronounced. "Tim!"

A faint, faint sound rewarded him: a scraping on the floor, a husky gasp.

He stepped within, snapping on the beam of his torch. He halted with a sharp oath at sight of the figure sprawled there.

"Tim!" he cried. "Tim, what happened?"

"Franz," the old fellow gasped. "Franz . . . shot me . . . took the . . . money. . . ."

Words died to bubblings in his throat as he struggled valiantly for the breath to speak.

"Franz!" Steve echoed. "He shot you down, Tim?"

"Yes,"—a faint whisper.

A tremor ran through the fragile body and it tensed as under a wave of pain for a moment. The light Steve held on Tim's face revealed the heroic struggle he made for strength to speak further.

One of the old hands, cold as ice, now, gripped his wrist.

"I'm dusted . . . Jimmy. . . . It's . . . it's money . . . and . . ." He was struggling against the darkness which closed over his mind, clinging to that remnant of consciousness that remained, fighting to keep mind and voice functioning until he had done the thing that he alone could do. "Money," he mumbled as Drake tried to ease his posture. "Money. . . . He took it . . . 'nd shot me . . . 'nd Katie . . ."

"Kate? Shot Kate?"

Steve's voice sounded like a woman's, so drawn by panic.

"Didn't shoot . . . her. . . . She heard . . . Saw him dust . . . me. He took her . . . tied her up. . . . Had canoe . . . and outfit. . . . Took her north. . . . Up lake. . . . Said he'd . . . It'll be . . . just h—l . . ."

Steve's moan was thick and heavy. His mouth was dry his heart flailed his ribs.

The old man's eyes were closing. He had lived to tell this, which he alone could tell. His chin sank to his breast; he seemed to nestle almost comfortably in the strong arms which held him. He had done all that he could possibly do. Now, he wanted rest.

But Drake could not let him rest.

"When, Tim?" he asked quickly. "How long ago? When did he go? How long ago was it Franz took Katie away?"

The suggestion of a frown crossed the graying face. Old Tim drew a slow, labored breath.

"Just . . ." he began and his chest collapsed and as the last of the breath slipped from his torn and tortured lungs it carried the long-drawn whisper: "No-w-w-w." The word was faint, but unmistakable.

Tim lay wholly inert in Drake's arms. The old heart had fluttered its last. Trying to be true to his trust, to function until he had discharged his duty. Tim had failed. So much had happened of treachery and pain in these last hours that it seemed to him as though Franz had only just then shoved off, bearing Kate as a hostage.

"Just," he had said; and then, after that last pause he was ever to make in speaking: "Now."

He was dead, slain in the service of the Flynns, but this was no hour to give way to regrets, to be concerned with the dead. One tragedy had ended and nothing beneath the stars could undo it, and another was in the making that very moment, perhaps, and a fear such as Steve had never known possessed him.

He went quickly to the far end of the room and took down a rifle from its resting place on a set of antlers. It was loaded. He slipped more ammunition into his pocket and ran out, closing the door behind him.

He strained his eyes up the lake to where the first stars struggled to show through the edge of the smoke haze. Franz and Kate must be somewhere not so far off, heading for the upper river and the big country to which it gave access.

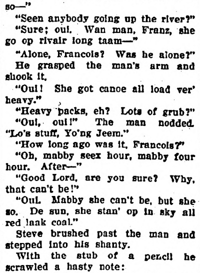
As he launched the canoe his only thought was swift pursuit. No idea that old Tim might have been mistaken in what he had told entered his mind. He felt that they were out there on the lake, almost within sight, perhaps still within the distance that ordinary sounds of travel might carry.

In the beginning the evening air was clear and he could see fairly well. But no craft, no movment, no suspicious shadow rewarded his vigilance. He stopped paddling now and again to listen. With an outfit and Kate in his canoe the fugitive would be unable to make much speed. The thing to be done then, Steve reasoned, was to get ahead of him up into the river beyond the smoke where he could lie in wait.

He approached the northern end of the lake. He was tempted to cut across to summon help, to call the entire crew off the fire which was a menace only to property and turn them out to head off the scourge which threatened such a precious thing as Kate Flynn.

And yet that would take time and Kate was Franz's prisoner and he knew he was capable of effecting rescue alone once he could locate that other canoe. His eagerness, his anxiety, therefore, upset his usually good judgment.

He could not sit still. If he had miscalculated, if old Tim had been wrong about the time of Franz's departure, they might be still beyond him. The wood camp was not far away; he would go that far, anyhow. . . .



"I Won't Be Gone So Long," Franz Said After He Had Swung the Canoe to His Shoulders.

A solitary window gleamed yellow as he rounded the bend below the dump, and he called "You, Francois? On the jump!"

It was the French-Canadian with a crippled foot who had given Steve his directions the evening that he arrived at Good-Bye. His crutches were discarded, now, and he hobbled with only the aid of a cane.

"Francois, you been here all day?"

"Oui! Dat foot, she hurt lak h—l so—"

"Seen anybody going up the river?"

"Sure; oui. Wan man, Franz, she go op rivair long taam—"

"Alone, Francois? Was he alone?"

He grasped the man's arm and shook it.

"Oui! She got canoe all load ver' heavy."

"Heavy packs, eh? Lots of grub?"

"Oui, oui!" The man nodded. "Lo's stuff, Yo'ng Jeem."

"How long ago was it, Francois?"

"Oh, mabby seex hour, mabby four hour. After—"

"Good Lord, are you sure? Why, that can't be!"

"Oui. Mabby she can't be, but she so. De sun, she stan' op in sky all red laak coal."

Steve brushed past the man and stepped into his shanty.

With the stub of a pencil he scrawled a hasty note:

"Franz killed Tim, took the money and forced Kate to go with him. Is headed up the river with a long start and I'm going my best. Send plenty of help on my trail and in a hurry. Not for me, understand, but Kate may need it."

"There," he muttered. "Now, Francois, you've got to get this note to McNally, somehow. Franz killed Tim Todd and stole money from Old Jim. Understand? If you take a long time getting this to McNally you're likely to sizzle in h—l for it!"

And leaving the bewildered chopper duly impressed, he ran down to the river and began paddling up the current, believing that a man planning a get-away would take the first portage into the Mad Woman.

CHAPTER X

On her back in the canoe bottom Kate Flynn was transported up the lake.

Until they were well into the smoke Franz did not speak. Then he said:

"Quite different, my dear, from a trip I'd once planned to take with you!" He laughed drily. "That was . . . another year." His mouth twisted oddly, as though he were drowning futile regrets. "I loved you, Kate. Maybe I still do . . . maybe. . . . With twenty-five thousand dollars and you . . ."

Not by so much as the flicker of a lid did the girl indicate that she gave heed, but her heart was in tumult.

Franz paddled steadily and after darkness had fallen guided his canoe against the bank and stepped out.

He helped Kate to a sitting posture and then to her feet. She was stiff and lame from her long confinement and swayed as if she might fall. He held her in his strong hands, peering close into her face with the bandage across her mouth.

"It's a long carry, where we're going. If you'll give me your word to come along, walk fast and not hinder me, I'll untie your hands."

She shook her head and made a courageously spirited sound.

"Good! If that's how you feel I should have no qualms. It's my liberty I'm working for, now. Nothing else counts!"

He stripped off his belt, backed Kate to a birch tree, secured one end of the strap about her wrists and tied the other to a branch at the height of her shoulders. By drawing down she could hold her hands at the level with the small of her back; when she did not resist the pull of the branch they were held high, in a position that strained muscles and tendons and forced her to bend far forward.

"I won't be gone so long," Franz said, after he had swung the canoe to his shoulders. "Maybe, by the time I get back, you'll be more reasonable."

Actually, he was not gone long, but to the girl a whole epoch passed before his return, unwelcome though it was. She wept at times and breathed irregularly. She tried to stand motionless at intervals and listen in the faint hope that help might be coming. But who could know what had happened? Who could guess where she was? Old Tim's body might have been discovered long since but what would that mean to McNally and that man who had kissed her?

They had called him Young Jim, but he was not her brother. Of that she was certain. Certain, too, of other things: his strength and resourcefulness and courage. Some unidentified wonder-worker was on the job at Good-Bye and had been for over a month. Could he help her, now? Could he come, and in time? . . . She began to sob again. . . .

Franz reappeared without a warning sound.

"Still here, eh?" he whispered. "And alone? He didn't come, then, did he?"—jeering. "He didn't get here in time!"

So the thing for which she had hoped gave this man concern! It in turn gave her courage.

He rearranged his pack and asked: "Will you keep still if I remove the gag?"

She shook her head.

"Fair enough! Will you walk?"

Again she indicated refusal.

"Well, once I wanted to hold you in my arms. Now . . . I'll have to!"

He unfastened the belt which held Kate prisoner, lifted her quickly and, holding her close, took the trail with his double burden. He went to the limit of his endurance and put her down with an oath.

"You kitten!" he snarled. "Holding you so . . . stirs memories and impulses!"

He kissed her roughly on the cheek and she struck out at him with an arm which still ached and throbbed from her experience at the landing.

He laughed, then, hoarsely.

"Don't like it, eh? Perhaps you'll have to. . . . We'll go on. Will you walk, now?"

She would walk, yes. A new terror was injected into her heart to mingle with other fears by the burden of passion which his laugh revealed. She nodded and turned, starting before him.

"Good!" he said. "It's better."

And now to delay him became an objective. Kate halted in the gloom of the trail and tried to make him understand she was tired, needed respite. He jerked the gag free from her lips, holding a hand ready to stifle any outcry.

"I'm weak! I'm tired!" she pleaded. "I'll walk as long as I can, but I must rest."

"Sit down here, then," he said grudgingly. "I'll give you a minute. . . . And I'll leave this off, if I have your word that you won't screech."

"No!" she said stoutly and the bandage again pressed her lips tightly.

As she sat on a boulder she worked her feet constantly in the trail, softly scuffing up the forest duff to attract the eye of any who might come that way later.

Long Voyages Made by Derelicts of the Sea

The recent sighting of the "ghost ship" Baychimo near Point Barrow, after she had been lost to the sight of men for a year and a half, calls to mind one of the sea's most captivating mysteries, though a dread menace to every sailor—the derelict, writes Louis H. Bolander in the Baltimore Sun.

The Baychimo is, or was, a Hudson Bay steamship loaded with a $600,000 fur cargo. In September, 1931, she was trapped in the ice off Wainright. The following month airplanes from Nome rescued the passengers, crew and part of the cargo. On Christmas day a heavy storm broke. The next day she disappeared, but a few days later was sighted by Eskimos. On their report a trapper visited the ship and removed $35,000 worth of furs. Again she disappeared, but was seen again by Eskimos in April, 1932. Since then, so far as the writer knows, no human eye has ever sighted the sturdy steamship, clutched in the remorseless Arctic ice.

There is something fascinating, something compelling in the thought of these lonely, broken, shabby sea hoboes drifting over the seven seas at the mercy of wind, tide and current. Though a menace to sober shipping there still clings to them an atmosphere of romance.

One of the most famous derelicts known to seafaring men was the schooner B. R. Woodside. She was forsaken by officers and men some hundreds of miles east of Savannah. At once she headed straight for Europe, but when she neared the Canaries, veered about twenty miles of her starting point. She then meandered slowly down the coast of Florida and then went zigzagging again across the Atlantic. During her career as a derelict she was sighted by no fewer than forty captains of ships in all parts of the Atlantic. Each one, of course, reported her then whereabouts to the hydrographic office in Washington. At last she was picked up and towed to Abaco, New Providence.

Still another famous derelict was the Fannie E. Woolston. For three and one-half years she wandered over the Atlantic, covering a distance estimated at 10,000 miles. During her journeyings she visited the coast of England, and then sojourned impartially along the coast of France, Spain and Portugal. She drifted down to the equator and back to America, where she was wrecked 3 degrees north of the spot from which she began her career as a hobo of the seas. This is not surprising when we find that it is not uncommon for a derelict to drift as much as 70 miles in 24 hours.

Safetygrams

by Fred W. Braun
The Safety Man

Again the Fourth of July is upon us. Every year thousands of people are injured and killed by the careless use of fireworks.

Fireworks should be exploded by experienced adults. Each community should have its own organized fireworks celebration which citizens, young and old, can enjoy from a safe distance without participating directly in their use.

The promiscuous sale of fireworks is dangerous. People trying practical jokes on others by exploding fireworks unnecessarily and dangerously handling them, should be warned against this practice.

Be careful on the Fourth of July. Enjoy this National Holiday by driving safely, by acting safely, and by working safely.

Serve Asparagus

YOU get out your menu pad and write: Lamb chops; creamed parsley potatoes (they're a little dressier than plain boiled ones)—You sigh. Just an ordinary dinner again. But wait a second. Write down asparagus. Enter asparagus and the whole menu is ritzed up at once. Here are some good asparagus recipes—equally good as dinner or luncheon dishes. Paste them in your cook book for handy reference.

Hot Asparagus

Asparagus au Gratin: Heat one can of asparagus tips and drain them. Arrange in a buttered casserole alternately with layers of sliced hard boiled egg (four eggs). Make a cheese sauce of four tablespoons butter, four tablespoons flour, the asparagus juice and milk enough to make two cups liquid, a quarter of a cup grated cheese, half a teaspoon salt and an eighth of a teaspoon pepper. Pour over the asparagus and cover with crumbs. Brown in a hot oven—400 degrees—for ten or fifteen minutes. This serves six.

Cold Asparagus

Crab and Asparagus Salad: Shred the contents of one 6½ ounce can crabmeat, and marinate it in French dressing for an hour, together with half a can of asparagus tips cut in inch pieces. Add a third of a cup chopped walnuts, and fork in lightly half a cup crisp shredded lettuce. Mix with mayonnaise, and serve at once. This serves six.

Jellied Asparagus and Pepper Salad: Soften one tablespoon gelatin in a quarter of a cup cold water. Add enough water to the juice from one can of asparagus tips to make one cup. Add one bay leaf, one sprig of celery tops, and boil for three minutes. Strain over gelatin and stir until dissolved. Add one and a half green peppers, finely diced, one boiled carrot cut in small pieces and a quarter of a teaspoon salt. Arrange the asparagus tips, tip end down, around the edge of a fluted mould. Pour in the gelatin mixture and chill. Serve, unmoulded, on lettuce garnished with mayonnaise and strips of pimiento. This serves six.

Quick Spinach

ONE of the reasons why Mother is grieved when Johnny won't eat his spinach, is that it has taken so much time to prepare. Even if she has a special little hose for washing it, minutes and morale are needed to do a good job of getting rid of all the sand. Mothers who know about food values and believe in saving time and temper often use canned spinach which is cleaned on a grand scale while it is still dewy, and is ready to use, giving Mother some extra minutes to prepare it in ways that even the most anti-spinach child will find hard to resist. For instance:

Tomatoes Stuffed with Spinach: Drain half a can of spinach (about one cup), add one tablespoon lemon juice and salt and pepper to taste. Have small ripe tomatoes peeled and scooped out into cups and well chilled. Sprinkle the inside of the cup with salt and stuff with spinach. Chill until ready to use.

Carrots in Spinach Nests: Boil until tender two cups new diced carrots and one green pepper, diced. Drain and add to a cup and a half white sauce. Heat the contents of one No. 2½ can spinach thoroughly, and pile in individual mounds on hot platter. Make a depression in each mound and fill with creamed vegetables. Garnish with bacon curls and crisp celery.

For Older Children

Spinach and Bacon au Gratin: Dice two slices bacon and fry them brown. Add the contents of one No. 2½ can of spinach well seasoned with an eighth of a teaspoon pepper, one teaspoon salt, a few grains nutmeg, an eighth of a teaspoon of paprika, and half a teaspoon chopped onion. Add one beaten egg yolk, and pile in a buttered baking dish. Cover with buttered crumbs and sprinkle one tablespoon grated cheese over the top. Bake in hot oven—400 degrees—for fifteen or twenty minutes. This serves four to six.

Spinach served on rounds of toast which have been spread with deviled ham also appeals to young palates—and old ones, too.

Marshall County Enters State-Wide Safety Program

Organization in Marshall county for definite participation in Governor Olson's state-wide project for prevention of traffic accidents was stimulated June 28 when C. H. Zealand, State Safety Director, met with local leaders at Warren and discussed with them the definite things that can be done by county safety committees to put a stop to "traffic murders."

Carelessness is so much a factor in the deaths caused in traffic, that Mr. Zealand said it was no exaggeration to call them "traffic murders." At the rate of three victims every hour of the 24, Death claims them, old and young, on the highways, and every 30 seconds, someone is hurt in a traffic accident somewhere in this country, he said.

"Too frequently the trouble about getting communities interested in doing something for the prevention of traffic accidents is that no matter what people hear in general about the rapidly mounting death toll, they are untouched by it all, until someone close to them meets a tragic death under the wheels of an automobile," Mr. Zealand declared.

He continued: "When your child, or the wife of your next-door neighbor, one of your county leaders, or someone whose fine achievements in citizenship or neighborliness has made him a greatly beloved person, whose loss is keenly felt by many of you, then do you begin to come to some realization of the growing menace of unsafe drivers of today's high-powered cars."

~~That now is the time to act in~~ an organized county movement that will be aggressive in calling a halt to the unnecessary deaths caused by traffic accidents, was Mr. Zealand's pronouncement.

Safety education is valuable in combatting the rising totals in the lists of killed and injured in motor vehicle accidents, Mr. Zealand points out. He said that study of facts, figures, and conditions under which accidents happen is convincing that failure to obey traffic rules and regulations is a major cause of the unnecessary waste of human life on the highways.

Such being the case, Mr. Zealand contends it is of the greatest value to arouse public opinion; to put moral force and stamina behind the authorities vested with the power of meting out deserved punishment to unsafe drivers who will not heed warnings; to do everything possible to educate ~~drivers~~, and to bring the public generally into close and purposeful co-operation in a program that will put safe driving behind the effort to end the present intolerable danger to motorists and pedestrians.

"The traffic problem is right here at our door—not off somewhere in the next town, or in a neighboring county," said Mr. Zealand. He added, "When you hear that traffic deaths are increasing, remember we are not talking about California or Penn sylvania. We are talking about rural Minnesota. Close to 200 have been killed in the counties of this state (and I am not talking about the cities at all) this year so far. The months when the greatest number of accidents and the greatest number of fatalities happen are yet before us. It is in the late summer, the fall, and the early winter months that traffic takes its greatest number of victims. Now is the time to act, if we are to halt unsafe drivers and educate pedestrians to do their part in preventing accidents."

Another Accident Occurs Near Scene of Previous Mishaps

Another bad accident was chalked up on the calendar here on Sunday afternoon. The wreck happened within thirty feet of where the last one occurred. It seems that when it rains, the State Trunk Highway in the north end of town becomes soapy and has one spot in particular which is hard to navigate at a high rate of speed.

While traveling north on Sunday, Rudolph and Henry Ristau of Thief River Falls took a bad spill near the Jim Peterson home when they hit the slope in the highway right after the rain we had. Their International pickup truck left the slippery road and rolled over twice in the ditch and caught fire. The car was damaged a great deal and had to be towed into Thief River Falls for repairs. Henry Ristau, who was just riding with his brother, suffered injuries to his back, and was taken to the hospital in Thief River Falls for treatment at once. The driver came out of the mess with less injuries, but he also had to have doctor's care.

The only solution that we can offer for this is to have the State Highway Department come here and put a light coat of oil on this spot and then sand it down. That may stop all the accidents that have happened there lately. This was the third tipover that has ended up in the ditch at that place in the past three weeks. In each case, the cars have been badly smashed and some of the occupants hurt so bad that they had to be taken to a hospital."

CAUTION: We wish to add that some of those who have taken these spills have passed through town at a speed which no sane driver would attempt, and still expect to have a sporting chance to save his own life or that of those riding with him, should anything go wrong. Seventy miles per hour is all right when you are on a race track, but on a highway through town it shows that the driver needs a little care as to his ability to calculate the danger he is putt-himself and others in when he crosses an intersection at such a swish of speed.

Remember: Death takes no holiday.

Gardeners Are Warned That Deap Hoeing Is Bad

Gardeners can save both their backs and their plants by not hoeing too deeply, points out A. E. Hutchins, vegetable specialist University Farm, St. Paul.

Deep garden cultivation injures the roots of the crop, he says, and the dust mulch thereby created is of no value in preserving moisture, as many experiments have shown.

The primary purpose of garden cultivation is to kill weeds, and this can be done satisfactorily by merely scraping the surface of the soil ~~with a sharp~~ hoe, thus cutting off the weeds. However, it is usually easier to cultivate the surface soil a little during this operation, and such shallow cultivation is advisable on heavy clay soil. This shallow cultivation should be given after each rain to kill weeds, as their seeds germinate, and to break up the crust formed when the rain dries off.

Hail!

A hail storm passed thru this part of the state late Sunday afternoon and did considerable damage to crops and buildings. The storm, which hit hard in spots, started northwest of Grafton, N. Dak., and traveled southeast to within a few miles of Bemidji according to reports that we got on it. Stephen suffered a big loss as far as crops and city property were concerned. Thief River Falls also felt the brunt of the storm as the crops around there and gardens in the city were ruined. Many of those who had gone there for the day to attend the Lutheran Assembly were caught in the storm and their cars were damaged a lot by the big hail stones that fell as large as eggs.

In McCrea township near Warren several barns were destroyed in a twister that followed the hail storm.

Magnus Grondahl

Funeral services were conducted here on Saturday afternoon from the Nazareth Lutheran church for Magnus Grondahl, pioneer of this community. Mr. Grondahl passed away at the St. Lukes Hospital in Thief River Falls on Wednesday evening of last week after a lingering illnes of several months duration. He was seventy-six years old. Rev. Redal officiated and interment was made in the Holt cemetery.

Haying has already started on a few farms. The hay crop will be good this year.

To Have Farm Bureau Picnic At Northwest School July 12

Plans are rapidly taking shape for a Red River Valley Farm Bureau Picnic at the Northwest School of Agriculture at Crookston on July 12 at which time Edw. A. O'Neil, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation will deliver an address.

Arrangements for Marshall county representation at the picnic are under way with a committee composed of R. A. Reierson, emergency agricultural agent, Geo. E. Willey, and Elmer Rosendahl of Warren in charge. The entire county is invited and urged to attend this big gathering of Red River Valley Farmers.

One of the big features of the picnic will be a barbecue at noon when three beeves will be roasted, barbecue style, under the supervision of J. S. Jones, secretary of the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation. Barbecued meat and coffee will be furnished without charge to all picnickers. All planning to attend should bring their own picnic lunch baskets along. The Farm Bureau Flag will also be dedicated during the day.

A program of sports events is being arranged which will include a Kittenball tournament between 4-H clubs with a team representing each county. Horseshoe contests will be open to everyone. Marshall county residents planning to enter the horse shoe contests are requested to communicate with Walter Goplin, Warren, who will be in charge.

The counties participating in the picnic include Kittson, Pennington, Roseau, Polk, Clearwater, Norman, and Marshall.

By this means I wish to convey to the voters of the 5th Dist. my sincere appreciation for your confidence at the recent Primary Election.

—18—

Franz ordered her on again. She obeyed reluctantly.

"Get along!" he snapped. "Get along faster!"

Kate was stubborn. He picked her up again roughly and pressed forward, holding her unnecessarily close, and she writhed in his embrace until he set her down. Then, for a time, she walked rapidly.

He permitted her a brief rest further on. To gain time, later, she tripped and fell purposely and lay on the ground sobbing.

"Get on!" the man raged.

She tore the bandage from her lips.

"You coward!" she moaned as he stooped and lifted her to her feet, ready again to still her outcries with a hand. "You'll never get away! You'll never get away from . . . from . . ."

She had faith but no name for the man in whom that faith reposed.

"Your Young Jim, eh? Mean him?" He sneered. "The d—d pretender! You didn't know he was using your brother's name and authority until today, did you?"

"Do you think he'd try to deceive me?" she asked, bound to betray nothing.

He stared at her in the darkness. She could feel his breath on her forehead.

"You're lying, now. What's he to you, anyhow?"

"My friend!"—stoutly and honestly. She felt sure of that much.

"Friend, h—l! Listen, Kate. . . . Handsome stranger comes to the rescue of the operation and the lady in financial distress falls for him. That it?"

"No. Of course not."

A surge of jealousy swept into his heart. He laughed scornfully. "The idea of you falling for a squaw man!"

"I don't believe you," she said simply. "Besides, even if I did, even if it were true, it would be beside the point. He has done so many impossible things this summer that finding you and taking you back to answer for what you did this evening should be a simple matter."

Franz slung up his pack with a grunt.

"Devil with him!" he muttered uneasily and glanced behind. "But we'll get on, regardless. I'll leave that gag off for a while. Screams in here won't carry far and in return I'll expect that you'll walk faster. Otherwise . . ."

He left that threat unfinished.

As the stars began to fade they reached the Mad Woman. A short distance from the river the trail forked. Walking through long grasses, they came to the canoe on the river bank, just below the swift water.

"You stand here," Franz said. "He'll have one more thing to guess about, if he gets this far!"

He launched the canoe, put the duffle in it and, then, track line over his shoulder, waded into the rapid.

The girl understood his strategy. Followers of their trail would see this sign, would believe that they had gone down-stream and would waste days, perhaps, in searching the lower country.

The man turned about and called: "Come on, now. Step into the water there and wade up after me."

Swiftly, with firm drags of her heel, Kate etched in the wet sand a crude arrow, its point up the river.

Before Franz had cause to call again she was in the water, wading after him as he had bidden, leaving an unmistakable message for any who might be coming to aid her.

And one was coming!

Through the darkness Drake paddled up the Good-Bye. It was long after midnight before he approached the flat where the trail came down the divide which separated Good-Bye from Mad Woman.

He landed at the foot of the trail, and turned on his flash. And after he had played the beam about the trampled landing and examined the birch he knew what had happened, even to Kate's tortured wait, bound helpless.

Rage swept him and for the first time in his life he was shaken by the desire to maim and kill as, canoe on his back, he plunged into the trail, trotting beneath his burden.

But only man tracks were there, revealed by the shaft from his flashlight. It puzzled him. Just the man sign, indicating two trips. But on one carry he had been weighted down until he staggered and sank deeply in soft places.

Then he saw where Kate had been put down for the first time and the thought that Franz had held her slender body in his arms made blood pound in his ears.

It was broad daylight when he reached the Mad Woman. He followed the footprints down the branch of the trail that led to the right. They had stopped a few rods from the water's edge; then they had gone on and the girl had stood waiting while Franz loaded his canoe.

She had stood still but not idly. The indicating arrow she had drawn in the wet sand stared up at him and he grinned and said aloud: "Good girl!"

Where Franz would elect to leave the Mad Woman, Steve could not know. But one thing was certain: he would not leave Moose lake at its lower end because the country to the westward was muskeg for miles. He would keep to the high land and high land was on ahead. He could not be so far in the lead now. These tracks left in the silt were not old.

• • • • • • •

In a little bay of the lake, as dawn came up, Mary Wolf was blowing up the breakfast fire. With the blaze going, she looked at the meager bed where her father lay, his back to her, and spoke. He did not answer.

She placed more wood on the fire and set a pot close to the blaze to boil. Again she called her father. Again, received no response.

Then slowly, apprehensively, she moved toward the crude shelter. She stood outside and bent forward, a hand at her breast, to see the face of the wrinkled, old man. She sank slowly to one knee and touched him. He did not move. Old Jim Wolf had followed his fathers.

CHAPTER XI

Franz paddled briskly. He believed he had left only sign which would indicate that he had gone in the opposite direction. Long channels threaded the groups of timbered islands and, looking backward, Franz had a glance now and then of the open water they had traversed. He stopped paddling to roll a cigarette, to consider, audibly, the matter of food. But he did not finish what he had started to say; did not complete the cigarette.

Far, far behind him a fleck had appeared on the water. He broke his words short, arrested all movement and then, opening his fingers, let paper and tobacco drop to his knees.

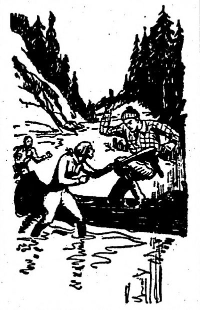
"So, now . . . More shooting?" he asked and Kate started up to a sitting posture.

For an interval both strained their eyes to observe that approaching canoe and then Franz laughed.

"If it's one, removing him is simple. . . . And it looks like one!" he growled.

He swung toward a point of rushes which projected from the nearest island.

The girl, gone white, now, did not speak as they glided into the screening growth. Franz drove one paddle into the bottom and hitched forward, placed the other on the opposite side of the light craft and turned to Kate. Queerly fascinated by his deliberation she watched him draw his pistol, slip out the clip and fill it to capacity.



She Jabbed at Him With All Her Strength, Hurling Him Backwards.

"You're going to shoot . . . from ambush?" she asked.

For answer he grasped her quickly in his arms, drawing her head tightly against his shoulder. With his handkerchief he bound her mouth again despite her efforts to break away and, again removing his belt, twisted the leather about her wrists.

"From ambush," he said. "I'm either making my get-away or exacting a heavy price. And if you try to make one move you'll be the first!"

He stroked the trigger significantly. Kate reclined in the bottom, making sounds in her throat, twisting her hands against the leather which bound them.

Steve Drake kept on. He watched constantly for another craft, scanned the horizon for the smoke of a campfire, even eyed closely the scattered flecks of froth and bubbles on the placid water in the hope they might yield some information of significance. No sign of life was present, however, except water fowl.

In the canoe screened by rushes Franz spoke the first word for half an hour.

"Alone . . . the fool!" Relief was in his tone, along with a terrible sort of elation. He twitched the muzzle of his pistol toward Kate and added: "I'd as soon send you with him as not. Remember that, if you please. When this is over, I'll land you at the head of the lake. You'll get back, somehow."

Steve approached the islands in a quandary. Beyond this first group, he knew, the lake opened again and it would be better to have a look there before he commenced searching out landing places for signs of recent travelers. Each moment that passed added to Franz's chances of escape, and as for Kate . . . He drew his shoulders upward in a shuddering shrug when he thought of her alone with that renegade.

Ducks flew up as he slipped past the first island and on their flight pitched toward a patch of rushes off to his left.

Gracefully, the ducks plummeted for it and then the leader, with a quick bank and a rise, was in full flight again, sounding an unmistakable note of warning to the others. Something was there, hidden from Drake by the rushes, which frightened the ducks. . . .

Almost in a reflex Steve dropped his paddle and grasped the rifle which lay between his feet, and hitched forward, weapon poised and ready to fire.

He was half-way erect when a man's head and shoulders emerged above the rushes and a girl's scream, sharp and clear, carried to him across the water.

The man was Franz, fifty yards from him. Franz, whipping his gun hand upward and Franz's pistol leaping as it barked!

Steve was poised on bent knees, clapping the stock of the rifle to his shoulder as the other fired. It was as if a sledge had struck the barrel of his gun, as though hot iron seared the thumb of his left hand, and the impact set him reeling, sagging, fighting to stay in the canoe but, despite his efforts, pitching over sideways with a mighty splash.

The gun slipped from his right hand as the butt raked the gunwale. He was in the water, on his back, the rifle slipping through his weakened fingers, sinking down into the depths to leave him unarmed.

He came up, the canoe screening him for the moment, and again he heard the girl scream. A bullet tore through the canoe an arm's length to the right of him and he sank at once, feet foremost, beneath the surface.

Kate Flynn, in a ferment of fright, had lifted her bound hands to the handkerchief across her mouth as Franz rose for his first shot. One jerk and the gag was about her throat and, heedless of the penalty that might be exacted from her, she had screamed her warning.

"D—n you!" Franz snarled. "You'll pay for . . ."

But he did not look at her. He stood watching, waiting, having more important matters than her disregard for his threats to occupy him at the moment. The girl tugged frantically at the belt holding her hands.

"Stop!" she cried after that second shot. "Stop it! He's helpless and you . . ."

Her voice failed her as Franz shot again and still again, drilling the empty canoe with lead.

He waited after that fourth shot, poised, pistol ready. He hoped that he had hit to kill, but was not certain and took no chances.

Steve, his lungs bursting, ceased his struggle to remain submerged, looked upward to locate his canoe and shot to the surface.

He all but gained that meager shelter without betraying himself. Only the flip of one hand beyond the bow of the craft gave him away, but that was enough and Franz tensed as he took careful aim to bore the canoe at the point where he knew, now, the other hung gasping for breath.

Kate saw and understood. She felt the tremor which ran through Franz's body as he steeled himself. And then as his hand squeezed to send the bullet speeding to where it surely would find a mark, she threw her whole body to the right as sharply, as vigorously as she could and drove the rail of his canoe to the water's edge.

The pistol exploded. The bullet tore up the water harmlessly a few yards beyond the rushes and Franz, with a retching oath, stepped into shallow water. The rising gunwale caught his toe and he sprawled in the rushes, throwing out his hands to save himself.

"D—n you—" he cried again, lunging to his feet. His hands, his wrists, were thick with mud and as he floundered up he turned the pistol to look into the barrel and swore again as he saw silt clogging it.

And Kate called shrilly:

"Quick! Quick! He can't shoot! He can't—"

Franz shook the gun savagely, tore at the slide to make it function and looked back to see Steve shoving the canoe recklessly from before him, striking out toward the rushes in a long, swift crawl stroke.

Franz, rapping the pistol on the canoe, watched Steve's rapid approach as he worked the slide frantically. It began to slip easier. He gave the weapon one more flip and mud from the barrel spattered the water about his knees. He turned, as Kate, with a desperate wrench, freed her hands. He laughed and raised his arm once more. His man was there, wholly exposed, coming closer all the time. . . .

"Come on!" Franz called thickly. "Come on . . . to h—l!"

And Kate was on her knees, wrenching one upended paddle from its place in the lake bottom. She tore it free, swung it with all her might and Franz, seeing from the tail of his eye, ducked sideways. But he was too late. The edge of the blade hit his arm, slithered down the sleeve to his hand, caught the pistol barrel and the weapon, with a spin and a plop, disappeared into the roily water.

"You'll pay . . . You'll . . ." he choked angrily.

He groped the bottom for the weapon but Kate leaped from the canoe, raised the paddle again. He fended the first blow with his arm and lunged for her but she jabbed at him with all her strength hurling him backward.

American and European Scientists Agree That Mineral Water Is Beneficial

TRY THIS NATURAL WAY

People spend hundreds of millions of dollars every year going to the great mineral water health resorts of Europe and America.

Many of these people have to travel thousands of miles. Many of them were suffering untold pain from "rheumatic" aches, from arthritis, from neuritis, from gout. Others suffered from certain stomach ailments or excess acid or sluggishness or a general rundown condition.

The scientific and medical records of Europe and America show that a very large percentage of these people gained blessed relief and help by these natural mineral water treatments.

Today, however, you do not have to travel long distances to partake of the healthful qualities of fine natural mineral water. You do not even have to pay the excessive cost of having it shipped to you in quart or gallon containers. For Crazy Water Crystals bring to your own home the precious minerals of one of the world's fine mineral waters in crystal form at a great saving in expense.

To Crazy Water Crystals absolutely nothing is added. All you do is add Crazy Water Crystals to your drinking water and you have a great mineral water which has benefited millions.

Congress Quits, Having Done Most Things the President Asked—Steel Strike Postponed—Roosevelt's Daughter in Nevada, Presumably for Divorce.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD
© by Western Newspaper Union.

AFTER several days of hectic work, pushing through the last measures labeled "must" by the administration and a host of other bills demanded by various members, the Seventy-third congress closed its second session. The measures passed during this session include some of the basic laws of the New Deal and considerable elaboration and modification of laws passed last year in addition to the regular appropriation bills and a normal amount of necessary routine legislation.

As in the first session, President Roosevelt was in full control, though the legislators displayed a more critical attitude and a tendency to give proposed legislation closer scrutiny before giving it their approval. This could not be attributed to a lessening of the President's influence or of the confidence in him, but rather to the fact that the members of congress didn't wish longer to be labeled as "yes men." On the whole Mr. Roosevelt succeeded in getting what he asked and in preventing what he did not want.

Several measures that had the backing of the administration failed of passage. These included the oil bill, ardently desired by Secretary Ickes; the pure food and drug bill, which never came to a vote; the ratification of the St. Lawrence waterway treaty; and a series of amendments amplifying and clarifying the powers of the AAA.

In its closing hours the congress spent money like water, indulging in what Congressman Britten of Chicago called "an orgy of spending such as never has been known in the history of the world during peace times." The last of the major bills disposed of were:

The deficiency appropriation bill, allotting the President more than two billion three hundred million dollars for relief and other emergency purposes.

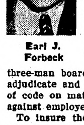
The one billion dollar housing bill to promote the revival of the building trades and of the durable goods industries.

The Frazier bill for relief of farm mortgagors.

The bill amending banking legislation.

The railway labor bill.

WILLIAM GREEN, president of the American Federation of Labor, succeeded where President Roosevelt, Administrator Johnson and all others had failed. He appeared before the delegates of the steel workers' unions at Pittsburgh and persuaded them at least to postpone their threatened strike. The plan which he offered, and which may lead to a permanent settlement of the controversy, in brief provides:



Earl J. Forbeck

Establishment of a three-man board by the President to adjudicate and mediate all violations of code on matters of discrimination against employees.

To insure the right of workers to organize, empowering the board to hold and supervise industrial elections for collective bargaining representatives.

All grievances or complaints would be referred to the board for final decision.

If acceptable to labor, capital, and the federal government, the strike would be called off permanently.

This was a modification of the plan offered by the administration and violently opposed by the more radical element among the delegates.

Leaders of the "rank and file" steel workers, including Earl J. Forbeck and other chiefs of local unions, were especially bitter in their attitude toward General Johnson, and were still eager for a strike, but they were outnumbered and the Green plan was adopted as a basis for further negotiations. The union leaders went to Washington for a final decision. They carried authority to call the strike if the peace plan were rejected by the government or the steel operators.

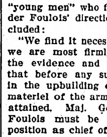
IN ITS second report to the President the national recovery review board, headed by Clarence Darrow, loosed another blast at Administrator Johnson and in effect recommended his removal as head of the NRA. The board said Johnson had given the recovery program an un-American and dictatorial tinge that handicapped it in the war on depression; that he has arbitrarily decreed life and death for industries, and that by arbitrary modifications of codes he has helped big business concerns to oppress their smaller competitors.

TERRORISTS in Cuba, who have been stirring up continual trouble for the Mendieta administration, precipitated bloody warfare in Havana by making an unprovoked atack on a parade of 35,000 members of the ABC, the island's largest secret political society. The radicals, ambushed in cross streets, opened fire with machine guns, pistols, sawed-off shotguns and rifles, mowing down scores of the marchers and many bystanders. About a dozen were killed outright. The ABC members fought valiantly with their revolvers and with clubs and stones. Later the fighting spread throughout the city, the students taking sides with the terrorists.

Col. Fulgencio Batista, chief of staff, declared martial law in Havana as soldiers, sailors, and marines struggled to stem the rioting.

Only a few hours before this furious battle, President Mendieta narrowly escaped death at the hands of the terrorists. A bomb was exploded behind his chair during a luncheon at a naval base across the bay from Havana, and he was badly wounded in the legs and arms and severely shocked. Two naval officers were killed and ten others were wounded by the blast.

SECRETARY OF WAR DERN and President Roosevelt have received a unanimous report from a house investigating committee demanding that Maj. Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois be removed as chief of the army air corps "without delay." The report accused the general of "dishonesty," "gross misconduct," "inefficiency," "inaccuracy," "unreliability," "incompetency," and "mismanagement."



Gen. Foulois

After praising the "young men" who fly army planes under Foulois' direction, the report concluded:

"We find it necessary to report that we are most firmly convinced, from the evidence and records submitted, that before any substantial progress in the upbuilding of the morale and materiel of the army air corps can be attained, Maj. Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois must be relieved from his position as chief of the air corps."

The report referred to "certain violations and evasions of law and army regulations by, also the gross misconduct and inefficiency of," General Foulois "and other executive officers under his command." Particular exception was taken to the fact that army airplanes had been bought by negotiation instead of after competitive bidding.

Striking back at the committee for its secret hearings, Foulois challenged his accusers to a meeting in open court.

"I consider that the accusations are most unfair and unjust," he said in a statement, "and I am ready and willing at any time to meet my accusers in open court."

THE fourth duke of Wellington died at Ewehurst, England, on the 119th anniversary of the Battle of Waterloo in which the first duke routed Napoleon.

By virtue of the distinction granted to the "Iron Duke," the fourth duke of Wellington probably held more foreign titles than any other English nobleman. He was prince of Waterloo in Netherlands, Duque De Ciudad Rodrigo, and a grandee of the first class in Spain, and Duque Da Victoria and Marquez de Torres Vedras, as well as Conde do Vimiero in Portugal.

ANOTHER divorce in the Roosevelt family is impending. Mrs. Anna Dall, the daughter of the President, has taken up residence in Nevada with the evident though not yet declared purpose of seeking legal separation from her husband, Curtis Dall, New York broker. The news was no surprise to friends of the family. The Dalls have not been living together for a year, Anna and their two children, "Sistie" and "Buzzie" residing in the White House.

Mrs. Anna Dall

For the six months she must remain in Nevada Mrs. Dall has selected a log cabin on the shores of Lake Tahoe, some fifteen miles from the house where her brother, Elliott, lived a year ago, when he and the former Elizabeth Donner of Philadelphia were divorced.

She and the two children arrived there accompanied by three secret service agents and her attorney, Samuel Platt. On the way west Mrs. Dall talked guardedly of her plans.

"It's rather hard for anyone to say he or she is going to Reno to get a divorce," she declared, with emphasis on the "get." "We may want a divorce, but there are any number of things to consider. It's easy to start out—but rather hard to carry through."

Neither Mr. Dall, in New York, nor anyone in the White House would say anything about the prospective divorce action. The Dalls were married June 5, 1926.

Men Ever Susceptible to Lure of Lotteries

It is curious that proposals for a strict curb on stock exchange gambling should coexist with a rising demand for the release of similar curbs on gambling elsewhere. In some congressional circles margin trading is considered wicked in itself. The professional speculator, fleeing from the stock exchange, is now to be driven out of the commodity exchange likewise. And yet, at almost the same moment, states are legalizing race-track gambling, for years under the ban; cities are considering means of capitalizing on the gambling propensities of their citizens, and even the federal government itself is being urged to adopt a national lottery.

Many profess to see no inconsistency in this. They hold that while speculation ought to be sharply restricted on the exchanges, for the protection of the investor and the whole industrial system, the gambling instinct is too deep-seated to be repressed altogether. Taking as their text Mrs. Roosevelt's recent remark, "It seems impossible to say to people you shall not gamble," they propose first to give them such national outlets for their speculative impulses as horse racing and, second, to turn at least part of the proceeds into public channels. Hard times have been as potent an influence in this effort as changing moral standards. Indeed, lotteries are regarded by their sponsors, like Representative Kenney if New Jersey, author of the billion-dollar veterans' lottery bill, primarily as a means of raising money to fill depleted government treasuries.

The lottery is an ancient institution. The Promised Land was divided among the twelve tribes of Israel by lot. Queen Elizabeth introduced the lottery into England in 1569, and for more than two centuries it was a regular source of public revenue in that country, soon spreading to France, Germany, Spain and Austria. England raised money for the British museum by means of a lottery. Kings college, now Columbia university, was founded on the proceeds of a lottery. We are told that the first French lottery, held in 1681, was won by the king, an outcome which for a time dampened the ardor of his subjects. After having been under the ban for a hundred years, the French lottery was re-established and met with instant popular enthusiasm. The best known and most widely patronized lotteries in the world today are the Irish Free State sweepstakes and the Calcutta sweepstakes.

Opponents of lotteries point to the long record of corruption and crookedness associated with them during their early use here and abroad. They condemn them on social as well as moral grounds, pointing to the fact that the desire on the part of hundreds of thousands of Americans to get rich quick in this fashion was one of the causes of our financial crash. It is also argued that lotteries with cheap tickets have their greatest appeal to persons with small incomes, and therefore operate as an anti-social tax on the poor. In considering the attitude of government toward gambling it is possible to draw a line between those measures which recognize changing moral standards, wide interest in horse racing, the difficulty of enforcing prohibitory statutes, and even the desirability of obtaining some public return from various sporting events, and those measures which seek to put the government, whether federal, state or local, directly into the business of promoting an outright gambling institution like a lottery.

A British royal commission appointed to investigate the subject brought in a report last year opposing the re-establishment of lotteries in England on the ground that private lotteries invited fraud, that the government should not engage in practices offensive to many of its citizens, that the psychological effect of a national lottery would be bad, and that the income would be only trifling.—New York Times.

Chance for Speculation as to Climatic Changes

While we are speculating about the possible causes of dry weather in our own region, we may note, for whatever it may signify, that in England they are giving serious thought to problems caused by falling of the water levels in streams, a phenomenon that has been developing for a couple of years now. That may be mere coincidence, but on the other hand it may suggest that conditions affecting a far wider area than just our group of a half dozen dozen Mid-Western states are at work. It may be that the areas which now seem to be particularly wet, not dry, such as some parts of the "East," are the exceptions, and that either the whole world or at least the northern hemisphere is in the dry phase of a long time cycle.

Everybody now knows, of course, that radical climatic changes do take place. That the ice caps at the poles have advanced and retreated is proven by the evidence of our hills and valleys and lakes and soil. Even some of the ancients surmised that there had been great climatic changes in Europe, by which the cold in central and northern Europe had greatly moderated. But these changes come over such long periods as to mean nothing to any single generation of men.

Whether there really are definite cycles, subject eventually to measurement, whereby weather conditions vary within a relatively brief period of years—say a fifteen-year wet to dry cycle or a forty-year wet to dry cycle—is not yet known. But there seems reason enough for even a nonscientific person to suspect it.

A hundred years hence, when a vastly greater amount of reliable information about weather happenings has been gathered in this and other countries, it may be possible to predict the next swing toward dryness and the next swing toward wetness with real accuracy, so far as any large area is concerned. Meantime we here in Iowa may rest on the fact that drastic changes in climate do not seem ever to come rapidly, and that several times in the past this region has known prolonged dry spells, only to emerge again into compensating wet spells. Nowhere on earth has there been, within the period of white men's knowledge, a more dependably favorable climate for producing the necessaries of life than in this corn belt, of which Iowa is the center.—Des Moines Tribune.

Death Ends Long Vigil

Mrs. Elizabeth Beasant, seventy-three years old, who died recently at Cushendun, a pretty seaside village in County Antrim, Ireland, waited 50 years for her husband-of-a-day.

One morning 50 years ago, Capt. Walter Beasant, the sweetheart of school days, made her his bride, and he left later in the day to take his three-masted schooner to Batavia.

The ship sailed, and was never heard of again.

John Beasant, the missing man's brother, said "her love never died. She refused offer after offer of marriage."

THE NEW FIRESTONE HIGH SPEED TIRE FOR 1934
Greatest Tire Firestone Has Ever Made

WORLD RECORD BROKEN

IT IS almost inconceivable that human ingenuity could build tires that would withstand the terrific punishment of the 500-mile grind at Indianapolis, May 30.

'Round and 'round the blistering track they streaked, hour after hour, under the blazing sun . . . the low moan of powerful motors rose to a terrific roar as they hit the straightaways at 150 miles or better—grinding, pulling, pounding around treacherous tire-destroying curves faster than they ever dared before. Sliding into the turns at these terrific speeds, there was nothing to hold the car to the track except the tire.

Mile after mile, lap after lap, greater and greater heat and increased centrifugal force developed to separate the tread from the body of the tire. Every conceivable force known was working to tear the tires to pieces—yet Firestone High Speed Tires, with Gum-Dipped High Stretch Cords, withstood this most gruelling test.

Thirty-three demons of speed—thirty-three cars equipped with Firestone High Speed Tires—all protected by Gum-Dipped High Stretch Cords—entered the Annual Speed Classic. Every tire was bought by the driver or owner of the car.

In all the heat—in all the grinding—in all the straining and pulling—not one cotton strand loosened—not one life was endangered by tire failure—not one car was forced out of the race by tire trouble. Six of the winners finished without a tire change. What a tribute to the Extra Strength—Safety and Durability built into Firestone High Speed Tires.

WHAT THIS MEANS TO YOU

The amazing record of Firestone dependability at Indianapolis was made possible by the Firestone patented process of Gum-Dipping. Every fibre of every cord in every ply of the tire is saturated and coated with pure liquid rubber; there are eight extra pounds of rubber to every 100 pounds of cotton cords.

There is greater adhesion between the plies of the Gum-Dipped Cord body and between the body and the tread. As a result of this patented process of Gum-Dipping Firestone engineers have been able to build a wider tread of flatter contour, with more and tougher rubber and deeper non-skid, giving you more than 50% longer non-skid mileage.

Don't delay! Call on the Firestone Service Dealer or Service Store in your community today and equip your car with the new Firestone High Speed Tires for 1934. Drive with security and peace of mind. Choose the Tires that Champions Buy!

THE HOLT CAFE

THEO. NESS, Prop.

A $1.00 Dinner for 4

IN a thousand ways, today's housewife differs from homemakers of the past. And here is the thousand and first! Her grandmother was taught to say "Never tell a guest how much anything cost you." How amazed Grandmother would be to hear two intelligent modern housewives proudly comparing prices of beef or vegetables, cent for cent. And she'd prick up her ears at some of the miracles in hospitality the modern woman performs by her skillful planning and buying. Here, for instance, is a delicious dinner for four which can be served for only twenty-five cents for each person.

Mustard Pickles 8¢
Ragout of Lamb with Peas 27¢
Buttered Spinach 15¢
Hot Biscuits 10¢
Lettuce or Romaine Salad with Garlic Dressing 12¢
Cocoanut Cream 25¢
Demi-tasse 3¢

Ragout of Lamb with Peas: Cut one pound of stewing lamb in pieces for serving, dredge with flour and brown with two sliced onions in drippings. Add three cups of cold water and two teaspoons of salt, and simmer for two hours, covered. Add the contents of an eight-ounce can of peas, two potatoes cut in small cubes or balls and half a cup of canned tomatoes. Cook, uncovered, until the potatoes are tender. Thicken the liquid very slightly with flour. Season, if necessary.

Cocoanut Cream: Soften one tablespoon of gelatin in four tablespoons of cold water. Scald two cups milk and one-third cup of sugar, and dissolve gelatin in it. Cool. Add a few drops of vanilla, turn into four wet molds and chill. Turn out, top with four tablespoons of raspberry or strawberry preserves, and sprinkle with a third of a can of moist cocoanut. Serve with two-thirds of a cup of light cream or top milk.*

The Picnic Season Opens

WHAT'S become of the old fashioned picnic that used to consist of two kinds of sandwiches, cookies, fruit, and lukewarm lemonade? Like the two cylinder motor and the kerosene lamp it was good in its day, but now it's laid away on the shelf—the revered ancestor of bigger and better picnics. Today's picnics have as many courses as a dinner party. A magician pulling rabbits out of a hat is no more breath-taking than the refreshment committee of a modern picnic producing cocktails, hearty plats du jour, salads, hot drinks, iced drinks, cakes and pies from the hamper and spreading a feast in less time than it takes to say: "When do we eat?".

Convenient Picnic Foods

The burden of preparation even for the most elaborate picnic falls lightly on today's picnic-planner. Baked beans, salmon, sausages, sardines, shrimps, Irish stew, lobster and soups of all kinds go to the picnic in cans. Tomato juice, favorite of open air diners, goes in its can or its bottle, and so do clam juice, sauerkraut juice, and the juice of the grapefruit and the pineapple. Only a can opener stands between hot and hungry hikers and such appetizing tidbits as fruit salad, crushed Hawaiian pineapple, golden figs and countless other berries and fruits.

"Help Yourself!"

The buffet supper party at which each guest serves himself has been a feature of winter entertaining. Undoubtedly it will be copied by some of the season's smartest picnics. The hostess will provide bread (which she doesn't even have the trouble of slicing, as it comes already sliced) crackers, and rolls. And she will set forth an amazing array of sandwich spreads, put up in extremely inviting looking packages and jars. The guests will help themselves and make their own.

For picnickers who prefer to make dainty sandwiches at home and cut them in fancy shapes with some of the newest sandwich cutters, here are some recipes for sandwich fillings which should add to the pleasure of a meal in a daisy-decked field.

New Sandwich Fillings

Peanut Butter and Mint: Spread the bread with softened butter, then with a layer of peanut butter and then with a layer of mint jelly.

Bacon and Pimiento: Chop the contents of one No. 4 can of pimientos fine, add three tablespoons chopped stuffed olives and half a cup diced fried bacon. Add enough mayonnaise to moisten.

Ripe Olive and Almond: Chop together equal quantities of ripe olives and blanched almonds. Moisten with Thousand Island Dressing.

Shrimps and Caper: Drain one can shrimp, and mince finely. Add two tablespoons of chopped capers, an eighth of a teaspoon salt and five tablespoons Russian dressing.*

Views and Reviews

In a certain small town in Minnesota, the story goes, an election campaigner called on the Editor. "Jim," the candidate opened up, "how's this? I find your newspaper listed in the official guide as Republican in politics, and here I find you working for the Democrats."

"Shhh!" Jim replied, looking around apprehensively, "my wife's Republican!"

Will Durant, in The American Magazine, said that, in the main, women are more conservative than men—women desire least of all a change in the order of things. This may account for most of the Republican vote in the not-too-recent primary election. But I have a notion that Durant may be wrong. I have a vision of thousands of farm women loyally voting the Farmer-Labor ticket, as tabulated election returns show. The question seems to hinge more on occupation than on sex.

The most popular topic, after the weather, is politics. The third is, What is Roosevelt going to try next? This statement disregards the report of an investigating committee that the chief subject of conversation of girls of a certain age is "boys", and that of young men of a corresponding age is "wimmin."

Hitler, the black scourge of Europe, recently purged his party of some of his best friends, who were allegedly plotting his overthrow. No doubt they were guilty; but the simple ruthlessness of the proceedings—arrest, then the firing squad—shows us that Germany, under Hitler, is now in the Dark Ages. Hitler is the supreme power; the people are but his checkers, whom he moves about to suit himself, in a game which seems to please him, but which sickens the entire world.

No wonder Darrow, the famous criminal lawyer, exclaimed: "I hope someone ups and shoots him!" Then, after the Nazis have purged themselves of Hitler, Germany should purge itself of the Nazis, and get back into the 20th century.

And now that commencement exercises are over, says an exchange, the graduate wonders, "Where, when, and what shall I commence?"

Crop and Soils Day at Northwest Station, July 16

The annual field plot visitation day will be held at the Northwest School and Station at Crookston on Monday, July 16. A full day's program has been planned with a tour of pure seed cooperators' fields in West Polk county to start from the school at 9 a. m.; picnic lunch on the campus at 12:00; formal program 1:15 and field plot inspection from 2:00 to 4:30; swim in the pool, 4:30 to 5:00.

The Red River Valley Crops and soils association will hold their annual summer meeting in conjunction with the tour and will present the formal program. Speakers from University Farm, St. Paul, and the Northwest Crop Improvement association will be present for the occasion.

Several farm clubs from different parts of the valley will celebrate their annual picnics on the campus and join in the program of the day.

A special program and tour of flower gardens, gardens, poultry houses, and school buildings has been arranged for the ladies, and a full program of sports, including a swim in the pool, is planned for the young folks.

Pure seed cooperators in West Polk to be visited on the morning tour include Alfred Solstad, Alfred Lindem, Wurden Bros., Ole Flaat, and Werman Skyberg. Highlights of the field plot inspection include: cooperative test of more than 100 farmers' lots of flax on wilt sick soil; sweet clover soil improvement plots; variety tests of wheat, oats, barley, and flax; pasture and hay trials; deep tillage on potatoes and wheat; potato breeding plots and increase fields of new varieties of potatoes, and cereal crops.

The Northwest School has agreed to furnish coffee and cream for picnic lunches.

"Dillinger" Car Taken Away

The Ford coach with which Walter Nelson of Grand Forks had perpetrated a number of petty thieveries here, and which has been held at the Engen Garage, was taken away Wednesday by Mrs. Lottie Nelson, the boy's mother, after paying expenses connected with it. She was the owner of the car. She left for Strathcona.

The authorities of Marshall county and Grand Forks are still looking for the young man who would be Dillinger. It might be well to say here that one should never steal—in small quantities.

According to eye witnesses, there were no car accidents in front of Jim Peterson's place this week.

Tunisian Family Moves to New Fair Village

From far-off Africa came this family to live in the Tunisian village on the Street of Villages which is a major feature of the new World's Fair that opened in Chicago May 26. Fifteen of these reproductions of life and scenes in far-away lands offer visitors a tour of the world in a single day. Eleven of these villages are grouped where the Midway was in 1933. Record crowds found the Fair complete and new on opening day.

Death of Mrs. Torger Ness

The community was saddened upon hearing that Mrs. Torger Ness had died at her home here Wednesday. She had been suffering for some time from a complication of ailments, and had been ill from the same causes off and on for several years. In the severe attack which came upon her the forepart of this week, death came as a welcome release for her. Her age was 74.

Funeral services will be held from the Mission church tomorrow, Saturday July 14, Rev. Myhrer officiating.

Finds Shark Teeth in Quarry

Ortonville, Minn.—They laft when G. A. Schnaser claimed he had found a set of shark's teeth on his farm not long ago, but a letter from H. C. Severen, head of the entomology-zoology department at Brookings, seems to indicate that the big fish really floated around where waves of wheat now roll in the wind. To clear up all doubts on the subject, Schnaser sent one of the black, perfectly preserved and decidedly sharp teeth, to Brookings, and last week received a reply stating that the tooth is "from one of the species of sharks, undoubtedly a flesh eater and possibly one who fed upon other fish." The set of teeth were found when a granite quarry was being opened on the Schnaser farm. The find is somewhat important, as the only previous discoveries of sharks teeth had been made in the western part of South Dakota.

Cattle on Barb-Wire Diet

Drouth or no drouth, two cows at the William Meyers farm near Blooming Prairie, Minn., decided to choose their own food recently, with dire results. Both cows died last week and an examination showed that they had been eating barb-wire and died from infection. The cows were both with calf, one of them would have had twins is two weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson and family and Peter Hanson left Friday morning by car for the West Coast, to visit friends and relatives. They expected to be gone about three weeks, and intended to visit all the principal points of interest along the way.

Warroad Pioneer Editor Dies

A. E. McDonald, editor and publisher of the Warroad Pioneer, died June 30 at the age of 71. His death was caused by complications which set in from a triple fracture in his leg which was not attended to for several days.

He was a resident of Warroad for the past thirty-five years, and edited the Pioneer for the last twenty-five.

Ernie Erickson reports that he recently captured a turtle which measured about a foot across the top of the shell.

Main street was graded down one day last week, which improved it considerably, as the chuck holes were getting quite bad.

One Hurt, Three Faint

Hackensack, Minn.—It was a sorry sight that met the eyes of Doris Cox, North Kansas City fire chief, who entered the summer resort of August Boberg near Brainerd last week and found four people lying on the floor, one of them in a pool of blood. But only one was injured, the remainder having fainted at sight of the blood. Ernest Boberg, son of the proprietor, gashed his leg deeply while using a knife, severing an artery. The first person on the scene was his mother, who promptly fainted. His sister also "passed out" when she saw her brother in the pool of blood, and a customer who entered just afterward had visions of wholesale murder when he saw the three unconscious forms on the floor and also promptly fainted from the shock. Cox kept his head, however, applied a tourniquet to the boy's leg, and rushed him to a hospital in Brainerd. His quick action saved the youth's life.

Frazier-Lemke Farm Moratorium Bill Signed

Contrary to an erroneous dispatch from Washington, released to the press on the 28th of June, President Roosevelt signed the Frazier-Lemke farm mortgage relief bill. The President signed the bill on the 28th, but did not make public his decision at that time. Those close to official Washington were so sure that the President would veto the bill, dispatches citing a veto were broadcast over the country.

The bill, drawn up by Congressmen Frazier and Lemke of North Dakota, calls for conciliatory committees to be set up in counties where at least 500 reside. Through these commissions, farmers will ask for a scaling down of their debts, both mortgaged and personal. Then should the farmer still be unsatisfied with the amount named by the court, he can file a petition in bankruptcy through which he will be given a six year moratorium, all the time keeping possession of his farm. Under the proposed law interest rates will be set at one per cent.

Backers of the bill believe that first mortgages will be reduced about twenty per cent; second mortgages and other liens will be cut in some cases as high as seventy per cent.

Steve Drake was within twenty yards when Kate struck the weapon from Franz's hand; within ten when she struck again with her paddle, was dragging himself through the shallows for the reeds when Franz turned in flight.

He gained the channel bank and dived. Breathing hoarsely, Steve followed. A good man in the water, this Franz, but he could not match speed with the one who now challenged him, who came on relentlessly, gaining fatefully. He looked behind and gasped out a curse. He threw his hips upward and dived . . .

He went under abruptly and drove himself down but Steve followed the eddies and bubbles he left, knowing the other's panic would cost him dearly though he might gain for the moment.

Franz came up to the right, shaking water from his eyes, gasping air avidly. A moment later he cried out as Steve's one hand fastened in his shirt.

Franz struck out, but the blow, though it caught Steve on the point of the chin, was light and ineffectual. Drake seized one of Franz's hands and twisted the arm cruelly. They went under, Franz's legs groping for a hold on Steve's, his fingers scratching at the throat.

They turned over. Franz tried to shove Drake deeper but could not and, as if by prearrangement, they broke their holds and shot to the surface, gasping for air. A brief interval they rested so, face to face, treading water, and then Franz commenced to swim again toward land.

But on his third stroke a hand grasped his ankle, his head was dragged under and Drake's body floated over him, binding his arms and legs close. He struggled an instant and then went limp.

Steve let him up, then, holding firmly to his shirt front while the man gagged and choked.

"You can't . . . get away," he panted. "Enough? . . . Will you . . . go back, now?"

Franz's mouth opened and closed convulsively. ". . . to h—l!" he rasped.

"Then I'll take you!" Drake cried. 'Hold you under . . . until you . . ."

Franz half turned and fought Steve away with thrusts of one arm. Beneath the surface his other hand was busy, seeking, tugging at something, and as Drake broke through his guard and grasped for a hold on clothing it came up with as much of a sweep as he could manage in the water and on that movement a glint of flashing brightness swept for Steve's middle.

He threw himself quickly on one side to elude the blade, gasping out a word as he realized he had failed. A sharp sting above his left groin manifested itself but he had the knife hand securely, twisted and wrenched it, sending the man under, holding him there mercilessly until the fingers finally opened and the knife sank slithering toward the bottom.

Then Steve had to let go, strangling as he was from the water he had swallowed. The sting in his side had become a burning. He gave that no heed, however. He raised one arm high and turned his face toward the rushes where he had last seen Kate.

"Got him!" he called hoarsely. "Bring the canoe . . . Got him . . ." But he winced from the throb in his belly which had by then replaced the sensation of burning.

He had believed he finally had Franz captive, but before his words were well spoken, the fellow broke loose and was swimming away. Steve followed, a great weariness, something more than the effects of this tremendous exertion, creeping through his muscles. He shut his eyes and used all his will to close quickly before that could happen which, it seemed certain, was going to happen, now. And when he opened them Franz was nowhere in sight.

He stopped swimming at once, treading water sluggishly and pressed one hand to his wounded side, wincing from the pain the touch rendered. Wearied as Franz was, Steve knew it would be impossible for him to stay submerged more than an instant.

Behind, he heard the canoe approaching. The sounds penetrated through a queer sensation in his ears. It was like a thickness, something hampering his hearing as fog will hinder sight.

The approaching paddle dipped rapidly. Still Franz did not show himself.

Steve brushed a hand across his eyes. His ears were going bad; were his eyes playing tricks, also? An odd warmth lay over his side, now; it was almost comfortable. . . . He caught himself sinking and struggled to keep afloat.

Movement hurt him, now. He moaned from the pain and then, a few yards beyond, came a ruffling of the surface. Bubbles. . . . Bubbles, coming upward from deep down. . . .

"Stay back!" he gasped over his shoulder and the sounds of the paddle ceased.

He waited an interval for breath. The sun broke through the clouds again. Somehow, its light seemed feeble. Perhaps his sight was dimming. . . . Nevertheless, he let himself under water and stared about and saw what he saw. . . .

Speech was impossible when he rose that time. He scarcely had strength to beckon Kate forward. It seemed that she would never get across that intervening strip of water; seemed as if he could not stay afloat another fractional second.

But he did. His fingers found the gunwale and curled over it. With great effort he raised his other hand and took hold and leaned his forehead against his wrists, breath quick and shallow, not caring a great deal, now, that what strength remained in his body seemed to be pouring into the lake through his side.

"Get in!" the girl said huskily. "Here! Let me help you!"

"No," he tried to say stoutly but the word came only in a whisper. "Please," he added. "Let me . . . rest just a . . . moment."

That was better. Resting was sweet. But the fingers of one hand wanted to let go. He shut his teeth and drew back his lip as he fought to retain a hold on consciousness. His job was not done. He had one more obligation to discharge.

"Where," he began, without lifting his face. "Where . . ." What was it he had wanted to say? What had prompted a question? . . . "Where's Franz?" he finished dully.

"Franz? He's . . . he's gone. You saw. He didn't come up. What's wrong with you?"—sharply. "What's happened?"

The lovely timbre of her voice shot through his veins like a stimulating drug. He raised his face to look into hers. Her eyes, those clear, widely set, blue eyes which had been bandaged when he looked at her closely before, set up a strength within him which gathered wit, marshaled his resources, gave him strength and clarity of mind.

"I'm all right," he muttered. "Tired. . . . What I started to ask was, where's the brief case?"

That was the thing he had left to do! Today was Wednesday. Tomorrow at four the contents of that portfolio must be in MacDonald's hands or all that he had tried to do for Old Jim Flynn would be as nothing.

"It must be here," the girl said. "He had it in the store. He talked about the money. He repacked some of his duffle at the first landing. But that's no matter now. Are you. . . Are you all right?"

"Right," he answered but his voice was thick despite the comparative ease with which his mind functioned for the moment.

"Get in, then. Oh, this is terrible! And we must hurry back to headquarters. They'll have found Tim and will be searching the whole country for us!"

"Yes," he muttered and tried to smile. They'd be searching, well enough. They'd been on his trail for long, now. But he must finish his job before more strength drained from his body. . . .

"I'll rest here," he said. "Paddle into the shallows. I might . . . upset you. . . ."

Kate picked up the paddle and headed for the little island. Steve did not look up again, but he knew that the girl's eyes were on him much of the time. His feet trailed helplessly behind. His side began to throb and sting. He felt bottom and floundered to a stand, clinging dizzily to the canoe so he would not fall.

"Should be in here," he mumbled, reaching uncertainly for a pack-sack. "We've got to know . . . now."

He loosed the straps of the pack.

"There!" He pulled back the flap, exposing the duffle within. "There it is!" He drew out the light leather case as if it were a great weight. His hands were cold, fingers like sticks of wood. He tried to open it and failed. . . .

"You better," he said. He couldn't let her know that he was hurt. He'd worked for her, fought for her; she was dependent on him, now. If she knew that everything was getting fuzzy . . . "I'm . . . still a little shaky, I guess. . . ."

"But come ashore first. You need rest."

"No. Open it now. . . . Please!"

She opened the case and exposed the red envelope, sealed and sound and safe.

A great sigh left Steve's breast and he lurched against the canoe, shoving it sideways through the reeds, all but falling across it.

"Good!" he said thickly. "Safe, eh? Listen! . . . Listen, Kate Flynn." He wet his lips and tried to fight back the overwhelming weakness. "Listen, that money's got to be—"

"You're bleeding!"

Her cry cut him short. She screamed out again that he was bleeding.

"Nothing," he muttered. "Nicked me a little . . . a little . . ." But he looked down, following her terrified glance, and saw the red life fluid seeping through and mingling with the muddy water in which he stood.

She got out of the canoe herself and stood beside him, putting a slender arm about his waist, dragging one of his over her shoulder.

"Come!" she said, calmly enough. "Walk with me. So." He tried to move but his feet seemed to be buried deep in clinging clay. He reeled as he tried and all but fell again. "That's splendid!" she said and laughed and her voice was filled with vigor. "Just a little way, now. Careful. Don't fall. There, that's better!"

As one would encourage a timid child she talked him into efforts which otherwise would have been beyond his strength.

"Here we go! We're out of the water, now. . . . Just a few more steps. Over yonder's some bracken. Better to lie in that than on this wet sand."

"Sure," he said dully. "Sure thing. . . ."

"Now . . . Careful. . . . Here, I'll let you down."

But she did not let him down. She could not ease the slump of his weight and it dragged her to her knees with his fall.

For a moment she knelt there, both hands pressed to her cheeks and eyes wide. Then she leaned forward, rolled Steve to his back and began chafing a wrist frantically.

His face had lost all color, his eyes were closed and a fine sweat pricked out on his brow.

"Can't you speak to me?" she begged. "Listen! If you hear me just open your eyes. Can't you do that much?"

But the eyes did not open. His breathing was scarcely perceptible and the hand she held was without the warmth of life.

"Oh, merciful God!" she prayed. "Oh, God, let me save him! Oh, God, let me serve him as he has served me!" And then, conscious of her own inadequacies for such a situation: "Oh, God, send me help!"

And then she called aloud for human help. But she knew screams were of no avail, and his life might be slipping away as she tried to make them serve.

Kate told herself this as she knelt beside this man, she did not know, whose identity, even, was not within her wildest guess but who, for weeks, had been fighting her fight and who, today, had saved her from whatever might have been.

She rummaged his pockets for a knife, found the slit in his clothing through which the wounding blade had cut, made it larger and exposed the lacerated flesh. Blood oozed out in regular gushes and, loosing the bandage which still hung about her neck, she spread its folds over the long gash, pressing it down, holding it firmly, fighting the tremors in her hands, sobbing a little and calling out to Steve to speak to her . . . just to give some sign that he heard her. . . .

CHAPTER XII

It was a long time before Mary Wolf finished the task of scraping a resting place for her father's body. Then she lowered it gently.

For an interval she knelt there on the soft, sweet earth, hands lax at her sides. "I'll ask the sisters to pray," she said aloud as if to end an annoying quandary and began scraping the fresh earth back upon the blanketed form.

She displayed no emotion. She was of a people which knows the futility of regrets. Her father had reached the end of an arduous trail. This was what she had known must be and it was better so.

She stopped once and turned her head to listen. That had sounded like a shot. For an interval she stood listening further and wondering . . . Well, if men were on the lake and came this way she would see them before they saw her and could hide until danger of an encounter was past. She would go back to Good-Bye and on to Shoestring. It was about school time and Young Jim had told her to go to school. She would do what he said. He was right. . . .

* * * * * * *

For hours, it seemed, Kate Flynn held that wad of gauze against the wound in Steve's side. In the beginning, blood had persistently oozed beneath the edges of the bandage but that had finally stopped. However, she did not dare relax the pressure. His life was in her hands. Others would be searching. She knew McNally and Wartin; she knew that with the discovery of Tim's body and her absence and the absence of this man whoever he might be, they would fling their companies of searchers far.

But it might be days before she was found and in mere hours the light rise and fall of this man's chest might cease. . . . She cried aloud at the thought and bit her lip and told herself again that screaming would do no good, that she must hold her mind and courage and strength under strict discipline.

Help was nearer, then, than she could have dreamed.

Bemidji—Failure of bidding contractors to include with their bids certified checks in the proper amounts drawn on Bemidji banks made it necessary for the city council to reject all bids offered for construction of the sewage disposal plant. New bids will be opened July 9.

St. Cloud—Adding to the burdens of the farmer, a new enemy has been discovered. The wild mustard and the Russian thistle have been reported seen in many sections of central Minnesota, crowding out stands of wheat and establishing themselves in places where grain has refused to grow.

Minneapolis—Veterans now enrolled in CCC camps may continue with the CCC after June 30, when the new enrollment period starts, Senator Henrik Shipstead wired Paul Nordeen, adjutant of the fourth district, American Legion. Before the regulations were changed, veterans engaged in emergency conservation work could not continue after June 30.

Northfield—The Northfied postoffice bill, was slipped through congress in the closing hour of the session in Washington. The passage of the bill will now permit the postoffice department to go ahead with plans for the new $50,000 postoffice building, construction of which has been delayed several years because of the litigation over the land on which it is to be built.

St. Paul—E. V. Willard, state conservation commissioner, was authorized by the state conservation commission to purchase 3,200 acres of land bordering the Arrowhead river, in the Grand Portage state forest as a game refuge and game production area. The tract will be purchased with funds from the public shooting grounds and game refuge account in the division of game and fish.

Owatonna—Construction of a proposed road on the Dodge-Steele county line has been ordered by Judge F. W. Senn in a district court mandate filed with Clerk of Court S. C. Goff here. The order demands that the two county boards act jointly in the project, which calls for a half-mile construction to link roads which now exist, using emergency relief administration funds.

St. Paul—The canvassing board cleared up the muddle in the close congressional races. There was some question in the second, seventh, eighth and ninth district on who was nominated. They were: Second—Henry Arens, F.-L.; L. P. Johnson, R., Elmer T. Ryan, D.; Seventh—Paul J. Kvale, F.-L., Richard T. Daley, D.; Eighth—A. T. Winterquist, F.-L., William A. Pittenger, R., Jerry A. Harris, D.; Ninth—R. T. Buckler, F.-L., Ole O. Sageng, R., Martin O. Brandon, D. Maynard M. Bartley, D., was returned the victor over E. G. Quamme for state treasurer.

St. Paul—Minnesota was alloted $5,425,551 by the federal government out of the $200,000,000 road fund for highway construction projects for the next fiscal year starting July 1. South Dakota was allotted $3,047,643 and Wisconsin $4,941,857.

Frazee—Fire which destroyed their farm home left eight members of the Louis Renollet family practically destitute of clothes and household furnishings. No insurance was carried on the house, which burned to the ground, and little was saved of its contents.

Cloth of Glass Hailed as Scientific Triumph

So much that is unusual and that would seem almost impossible to the lay mind, is now being accomplished by modern science, one is not surprised to learn that a cloth which has all the appearance of glass is the latest product of Lancashire research. Designs in colored glass are applied without laborious handwork to velvet, silk, lace, cotton and fabrics of all kinds, imparting to them the attraction of a diamante-studded gown.

Experiments along this line have been going on for months in Manchester and they have now reached a stage that justifies actual manufacture. The new product is expected to prove an asset in Lancashire's battle against Japanese competition. The makers of the new cloth use a synthetic glass which allows the cloth to be washed or ironed without damage to its design. The cloth to be printed is simply passed through a machine which indelibly impresses on it any design that is wanted.—London Mail.

Little Girl's Face Inflamed by Psoriasis
Healed by Cuticura

"My little girl's face was so inflamed that her eyes were swollen almost shut. The trouble was diagnosed as psoriasis. She scratched night and day and was not able to obtain rest. The scratching aggravated the trouble and each finger tip was red and swollen with infection. She became so emaciated that she was very pathetic looking.

"After three months' suffering I recalled the Cuticura treatment used by my mother. I bought a cake of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment and used them according to directions. The first treatment brought relief and she is now healed." (Signed) Mrs. Marie I. Johnson, 4720 Ames Ave., Omaha, Neb., March 14, 1934.

President Cleans Desk for Hawaii Cruise—Drouth Relief Funds Allocated for Middle West—Federal Reward for Dillinger's Arrest.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, back from his brief trip to New Haven, New London and his home in Hyde Park, put in a busy week clearing up his desk for his departure on the long planned cruise through the Panama canal to the West coast and Hawaii. All those who have had occasion during the last generation to call at the White House are glad to learn that Rudolph Forster was selected by the President to make the voyage with him. Since the days of McKinley this able and courteous gentleman, now executive clerk in charge of the White House executive offices, has been on duty and never before has he accompanied any President on a trip. Now Mr. Forster is going to have a real vacation, and Secretaries Howe, McIntyre and Earle will remain behind to take care of the White House. There will be no other civil officials aboard the cruiser Houston, and Mr. Roosevelt will isolate himself from business so far as is possible.

Rudolph Forster

On the way down to the canal Mr. Roosevelt will visit Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. From Panama City he will go to the Hawaiian Islands, first making a brief stop in Colombia. Returning to the Pacific coast early in August Mr. Roosevelt will travel overland by rail, and there is a possibility he will make some speeches, probably in Minneapolis and Green Bay, Wis., where the tercentenary of the Badger state will be celebrated.

IMMEDIATE relief for the drouth stricken areas in the Middle West was decreed by the President in an executive order which allocated $56,250,000 for direct aid. The remainder of the first distribution of federal relief for the drouth area included $43,750,000 for purchase of seed, food and live stock; $25,000,000 for seed and feed loans, $12,500,000 for purchase of lands in the drouth regions, and $12,500,000 for establishment of civilian conservation camps in the stricken region.

POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY and Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau came forward with an announcement of their plans for the spending of $110,000,000 in the construction of new post offices and federal buildings.

In all, 626 communities in every state and four territories have been selected for new federal buildings, according to the announcement. Half of the program—302 buildings—will be undertaken with $65,000,000 authorized for that purpose in the recently enacted deficiency-emergency appropriation bill. It was explained that 324 buildings will be constructed with "funds already available from other sources."

In selecting the projects to be included in the new program Mr. Farley and Mr. Morgenthau stated they were guided by the language of the deficiency bill directing that they "endeavor to distribute the projects equitably throughout the country so far as may be consistent with the needs of public service," and "with a view of relieving country-wide unemployment."

New York state gets more of the new buildings than any other state, with 59 of its communities slated to get new post offices, custom houses, or court houses. California, traditionally high on the list when federal money is being handed out, comes second with 51 projects. Third is Pennsylvania with 45, Texas is fourth with 35, and Illinois fifth with 32.

WHILE Secretary of Labor Perkins, the steel masters and the steel workers were studying out the road to permanent peace in the steel industry, the American Iron and Steel institute issued a statement claiming that 90.12 per cent of workers "eligible and available to vote" in eight major steel companies' employee representation plans had cast ballots at final elections, compared with approximately 85 per cent at the primaries.

The institute made public final figures on the elections balloting, showing 193,362 workers participated out of a total of 214,561 eligibles.

A district organizer for the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers was nominated as an employee representative in a plant of the United States Steel corporation, the institute said, but was defeated in the elections.

The institute termed the figures a confirmation of "the position of the steel industry that strike talk by union leaders was not supported by the vast majority of employees."

IN ACCORDANCE with a resolution adopted by congress, Secretary Morgenthau announced that after July 1 every liquor bottle made and sold in this country must have the name of the manufacturer and distiller or rectifier blown into the glass. The purpose of this measure is to halt bootlegging, but the bottle jobbers declare its effect will be to foster monopoly and increase the prices of liquor. Harold J. Fishbein of Chicago, representing the National Bottle Jobbers' association, said the regulation would virtually wipe out every small jobber.

"This entire measure is based on a misconception," he declared. "Prepohibition experience showed that the bootlegger could always get bottles of whatever kind he had need. Even if it were possible to dry up every source of legitimate supply of bottles to the bootlegger, the supposed goal of the regulation would never be reached.

"Why, every bellboy, every saloonkeeper, and apartment building janitor would become a source of bottle supply."

IN A formal letter, accompanied by a long explanation, the code authority of the cleaners and dyers have notified the President that it has withdrawn its consent to the code. The reason assigned for this action is that Administrator Johnson, acting by authority of the President, suspended the minimum price and other fair trade practice provisions of the code while leaving in effect all other provisions, including those establishing minimum wages and maximum hours of labor.

The cleaners and dyers say that with operating costs greatly increased by the labor provisions it is impossible to make a profit unless a minimum price is established and enforced.

In its appended explanation the code authority challenged the validity of this action by General Johnson, continuing:

"We cannot believe that you would knowingly countenance a reckless disregard of repeated promises and assurances given to authorized representatives of the trade by the administrator personally within two weeks of the date on which he played a major role in their breach."

The code was consented to, says the memorandum, "on the express understanding" that the minimum price and other trade practice provisions "were absolutely necessary if members of the trade were to comply with other provisions of the code, including the limitations on maximum hours and minimum wages of labor." The suspension of the minimum price provision is pronounced "a deprivation of the primary benefit of the code to members of the trade, leaving them only the burdens."

UNCLE SAM is determined to get John Dillinger, the country's most notorious desperado. A few days ago Attorney General Cummings offered a reward of $10,000 for the capture of the murderer and bank robber, and half as much for information leading to his arrest. At the same time the attorney general offered $5,000 for the capture of Lester M. Gillis, alias "Baby Face" Nelson, Dillinger's right-hand man. Information leading to Gillis' capture will be rewarded with $2,500.

John Dillinger

This action was followed up by consideration of plans for co-ordinating federal, state, and local efforts to catch Dillinger. It was understood that plans using the army and National Guard in the offensive were under discussion.

The federal charge against Dillinger is transporting a stolen automobile across the state line. Nelson is wanted in connection with the murder of W. Carter Baum, Department of Justice agent, near Rhinelander, Wis., April 23.

In addition to the federal prize, the person who can catch Dillinger will receive $1,000 reward from each of five states—Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio and Minnesota.

INFORMATION was given the house committee investigating War department expenditures that prices quoted the government on automobiles have jumped since the issuance of the executive order excluding Henry Ford from bidding until he certifies compliance with the NRA. Representative Kvale of Minnesota said he had evidence to back up this charge, and that the situation has cost the government thousands of dollars already.

"For Henry Ford to submit a certificate for compliance," Mr. Kvale said, "would mean he would have to secure 5,000 certificates of compliance from those who furnish parts and products for his cars. That is obviously impossible."

The committee called on War department officials to reply to this accusation.

JIMMY WEDELL, famous aviator who last year set a new land plane speed record of 305.33 miles an hour, was instantly killed at Patterson, La., when an English Gypsy Moth plane crashed. A student flyer with him was critically injured.

Criminal Often Helped by Laws of Extradition

Extradition law is a tricky thing to handle. At first sight it seems a simple thing. If a citizen of Ruritania flees into Cadonia because he does not wish to be dealt with by the laws of his own country, Ruritania has every right to say to Cadonia, "Hand over our citizen, so that we may investigate these charges against him."

In actual practice it is not so easy, states the Cape Argus. To begin with a refugee can only be delivered up to the officers of the law if the offense charged is also an offense under the code of the country in which he has taken refuge. But these things differ. A man can commit a deed which in Great Britain is punishable, and, by taking refuge in certain foreign countries, be free from anxiety, because it does not figure in the penal code of those countries.

A bank clerk in New York did some clever juggling with the funds under his control and went to London. Hot on his heels went a couple of New York detectives; and application for extradition was made. Unfortunately for his pursuers, his offense was described as "forgery," and in English law it is not so regarded.

Therefore, the English magistrate had no hesitation in refusing the application, and the sleuths from New York went away sorrowful.

Offenses generally regarded in international treaties as extraditable are murder, attempted murder, or manslaughter, also such crimes against the community as arson, bigamy, embezzlement, fraud, counterfeiting and kidnaping. An absconding fraudulent bankrupt may also be pursued and brought back.

But mere wounding, or doing bodily harm to a person, is not extraditable—unless permanent injury or incapacity is caused. So if you beat up your enemy and then flee to Spain or France, or somewhere handy, you are safe from the vengeance of your own country's laws.

It is well known that political offenders are safe from extradition, which is why unsuccessful revolutionaries and plotters against governments spend so much time in exile. But the police of several countries have been wily enough to try to get round this provision.

When they have wanted a political refugee they have brought a criminal charge against him, so as to get him into his own country, where he could be dealt with for his political offense.

This little dodge, though, is defeated by the laws of extradition; for, if required, the police applying for extradition are bound to show that their man is not to be charged with any infraction of the law in connection with the politics of his native country.

On one occasion the police of a certain foreign power were anxious to reclaim a political offender who had fled to London, so they unearthed a trifling robbery of which he had been guilty some years before, and tried to get him extradited on that. But his counsel was able to prove, to the satisfaction of the London magistrate, two important facts.

One was that he had paid back the stolen money, and the other was that a prosecution begun at the time had been dropped. So once again the foreign detectives had to depart without their prey.

But the person whose extradition is sought is further protected by the laws of the hospitable country in which he has sought safety. Apart entirely from politics, he cannot be tried, if extradited to his own land, for any other crime than that specifically charged in the application.

The said application must be accompanied by a warrant granted in the fugitive's own country.

There are one or two other odd points about extradition. Some countries will not deliver up their own citizens. Spain is one of these; so, as an illustration, take the case of a Spaniard who offends against our laws and bolts to his native land.

The Spanish authorities will not give him up to be brought back and tried. Spain's neighbor, Portugal, does not surrender refugees to countries where capital punishment is in force.

Other countries beside Spain who will not surrender their own nationals are Austria, Italy, Germany, Greece, Brazil and Switzerland.—Montreal Family Herald.

SAFEST TIRE FIRESTONE EVER BUILT

THE New Firestone High Speed Tire for 1934 was built to give you the same dependable service it provided for the 33 drivers who started in the torturous 500-mile grind at Indianapolis May 30.

This new tire has a wider tread of flatter contour, deeper non-skid, more and tougher rubber, giving you more than 50% longer non-skid mileage.

Besides being Safety Protected on the outside it is Safety Protected on the inside. Eight additional pounds of pure rubber are absorbed by every one hundred pounds of cords. This additional rubber surrounds every cotton fiber inside every cord in every ply. This is accomplished by soaking the cords in liquid rubber by Gum-Dipping, a Firestone patented process.

Heat caused by internal friction of cotton fibers destroys tires—causes separation and blowouts.

Gum-Dipping counteracts friction and heat—provides greater adhesion and strength, assuring car owners of the greatest Safety, Protection and Economy that it is possible for human ingenuity to build into a tire.

Every one of the 33 drivers at Indianapolis chose and bought Firestone High Speed Tires. Race drivers KNOW tire construction—they will not risk their lives or chance of victory on any other than Firestone.

At terrific speeds the cars plunge into the treacherous turns—tires are braced against the scorching brick track—so hot the tires fairly smoke at times—they give—yield and stretch—every conceivable force works to tear the tire to pieces, yet Firestone High Speed Tires "come back" on the straightaways. Not once during the entire race did a tire fail.

Surely this is the most amazing proof ever known of Extra Strength, SAFETY and Dependability. Call on the Firestone Service Dealer or Service Store nearest you TODAY. Equip your car with new Firestone High Speed Tires for 1934.

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN, The Safety Man

I have written repeatedly on forest fires and their prevention and I want to give you six prominent rules to follow on your camping trips.

1. Be sure your match is out. Break it in two before you throw it away.
2. Be sure that pipe ashes and cigar or cigarette stubs are dead before throwing them away. Never throw them into brush, leaves, or needles.
3. Before building a fire scrape away all flammable material from a spot five feet in diameter.
4. Never break camp until your fire is out—dead out.
5. Never burn slash or brush in windy weather.
6. Stir the coals while soaking them with water. Turn small sticks and drench both sides. Wet the ground around the fire. Be sure the last spark is dead.

These recommendations are made by the American Forestry Association and we should be sure that they are observed at all times so that our forests will not burn.

YOUR NEED OF IODINE

HAVE you ever boarded a street car and then discovered that your purse contained only four pennies instead of the necessary five? Only one little penny missing, but what a difference it made! Doctors tell us that no diet is complete without iodine. Every one of us—man, woman, and child, must have some every day. Only 0.05 of a milligram, to be sure—but with that 0.05 missing, we cannot travel far along the road to good health. Without iodine, we may develop goiter and thyroid trouble and our children may be dwarfed in stature and even feeble minded.

The Riches of the Sea

Valuable as iodine is, it is not scarce or difficult to obtain. All the year around we get a supply of Grade A iodine from fish, oysters, and other sea foods. The sea nourishes its creatures well. Its water gives its tenants a rich diet because all rivers and streams flow into it, bringing minerals which rains have washed out of the earth. In addition to this, the sea grows an invisible garden of very tiny plants which float on the surface of the waves and absorb sunlight. Fishes feeding on these are literally full of vitamins. Thus Vitamin A is a gift of the sea especially through the cod and the salmon.

Vitamin D and phosphorus which wards off tooth decay, copper and iron, helpful in anaemia, and last but not least our indispensable iodine are other riches from the sea's treasury brought to us by every sea food from the mackerel to the sardine. It's an important fact, too, that none of the iodine is lost when fish are canned.

Plenty of Milligrams

If you have only one fish day a week—Friday—in your home, these recipes for new fish dishes may make you decide to inaugurate the habit of two a week—or even three. Every one is guaranteed delicious and assures your family of many more milligrams of iodine than the 0.05 which is the minimum amount each person should have each day.

Salmon au Gratin: Fork together lightly two cups of salmon, two cups mashed potatoes, six tablespoons milk, six tablespoons melted butter, salt and pepper. Sprinkle half a cup grated cheese over the top; then buttered crumbs over the cheese. Brown in a moderate oven—375 degrees—for about twenty minutes. This serves eight.

Luxor Salmon Mold: Mix together in the top of a double boiler a teaspoon and a quarter salt, one teaspoon mustard, a few grains cayenne, two egg yolks, and a tablespoon and a half butter. Add one cup of milk and three tablespoons vinegar, and cook until thick. Soften four teaspoons gelatin in four tablespoons water and dissolve in this mixture. Cool. When beginning to thicken, add contents of one 1-pound can salmon, flaked, half a cup peas and half a cup chopped walnuts, and mold in a fish-shaped mold. This serves eight.

Cod and Oysters

Jellied Codfish: Make a white sauce of two tablespoons butter, two tablespoons flour, one and a half cups milk, salt and pepper, and one slightly beaten egg. Dissolve in it one tablespoon gelatin which has been soaked in four tablespoons cold water. Cool. Fold in contents of two 10-ounce cans codfish flakes and eight chopped sweet pickles, and mold as desired. Chill. This serves eight to ten liberally.

Codfish Flakes in Cream Sauce: Flake contents of one 10-ounce can codfish cakes, in large rough pieces, using a fork. Drop into deep hot fat— 390 degrees—and fry until brown. Drain and serve with a sauce made by melting two tablespoons butter, adding two tablespoons flour, and then gradually adding a cup and a half diluted evaporated milk and cooking until thick. Add two tablespoons minced parsley, salt, pepper and one teaspoon lemon juice. This serves four.

Chicken and Oyster Patties: Make a cream sauce of a tablespoon and a half butter, a tablespoon and a half flour, one cup thin cream, half a teaspoon salt, an eighth of a teaspoon celery salt, and a few grains paprika. Add a quarter of a cup shredded canned pimientos, the contents of one 5-ounce can oysters scalded in their liquor, and two cups diced chicken. Serve at once in hot patty shells. Fills six to eight patties.*

Views and Reviews

[The views below do not necessarily coincide with the official beliefs of this publication; they are merely personal observations.]

At the other extreme from Herr Hitler's "kangaroo court" methods are the ways of American courts. Last week the final legal obstacle was removed before trying Samuel Insull, utility magnate. Everyone is familiar with Insull's evasion of arrest. It seem there is too much red tape and legal frippery for a man of Insull's wealth to use in putting off the day of reckoning. What we need in this country is justice without all the red tape.

Doubtless we have all been guilty of changing around letters, syllables, or whole words in a spoken sentence, while excited. These curious words (for example: calling a bootlegger a lootbegger, a letbooger, or a boogletter; or saying sporn-rimmed hectacles) are called "Spoonerisms." They got this name from Wm. A. Spooner, an English clergyman, whose chief claim to fame is that his tongue would slip at the most critical point on solemn occasions. Thus, a "crushing blow" became a "blushing crow" and the "dear queen" became the "queer dean." But the fellow who out-Spoonered Spooner was the page in the State Legislature at Albany, N. Y., who was an eyewitness to the explosion of the boiler of the OLIVER ELLSWORTH, which made regular trips on the Hudson between Albany and New York. Bursting excitedly into the legislative halls, the page cried: "Sister Meaker and lembers of the megislature! Circular singumstance! The Elliver Olsworth's biled her buster!"

It seems to be a widespread conviction that socialism will be adopted in the USA sooner or later. We already have socialism in the operation of our postoffices, our public roads, and in such projects as the Tennessee Valley Authority. In Norway and Sweden, and several other European countries the government has successfully run the railroads for years. Deep thinkers today realize that it is only a matter of time before the government will take over not only the railroads, but the basic industries in the USA. This is neither a threat nor a promise—it is a prediction. One cannot escape the logic of world events. ---B.C.H.

Bituminous Roads To Be Retreated

More than 1,350 miles of bituminous surfaced trunk highways will be given retreatments this summer by the maintenance division of the state highway department, according to a department announcement.

Within the past few days the department has purchased 4,871,000 gallons of bituminous material for approximately $320,000. It has also awarded contracts in each of the sixteen maintenance districts of the state for the application of the material purchased. The cost of application will be $68,000.

Maintenance crews have been busy getting the roads in shape for retreatments. Highway No. 32 north of Thief River Falls will be retreated, and trucks have been hauling gravel this week for that purpose. Bituminous work will be at its peak in the next few weeks. There are approximately 2,700 miles of bituminous treated roads in the trunk system.

McGuire Plaque Presented To the Northwest School

The presentation of a bronze plaque of A. J. McGuire, the late manager of Land O'Lakes Creameries, to the Northwest School of Agriculture was one of the impressive features of the program at the Farm Bureau barbecue at Crookston July 12. State Commissioner of Agriculture, R. A. Trovatten, made the presentation speech. Mr. Trovatten paid high tribute to Mr. McGuire and his word in building up the cooperative spirit in Minnesota. T. M. McCall, acting superintendent of the school, in accepting the plaque for the school, stated that A.J. McGuire represented the ideal type of agricultural school graduate and his life and accomplishments would always be an inspiration to students in the schools of agriculture.

The plaque was donated by friends of A. J. McGuire. The Red River Valley Dairymen's association sponsored the collection of funds for the plaque. It was made by a sculptor from the St. Paul School of Art and is 18x30 inches in size.

Annual School Meeting Held

Twenty-two votes were cast at the annual school meeting of Dist. 35 held in the schoolhouse Tuesday evening. This is slightly better than the nine votes cast last year, considering the fact that the election was not advertised; but the slim vote reflects an indifference on the part of the taxpayers that is not to be bragged about.

Geo. Fricker and R. A. Werner were re-elected to the Board, while Sam Lorentson was elected director to take the place of the late C. L. Sandberg.

Those holding over are G. Sanoden, Theo. Ness, and O. H. Nohre.

To Open Store at Warren

The Carlson Mercantile Company, operators of four stores in Marshall and Roseau counties, have signed a lease for the People's Trading Company building (in Warren) and plan to open a general merchandise store here on Sept. 1, according to Verner Nelson, secretary of the Warren Building & Loan Assn., owners of the building.

Stores are operated by the Carlson Company at Middle River, Holt, and Stephen in Marshall county and at Greenbush in Roseau county. The Stephen store was opened about a year ago. The company is owned by Arvid Carlson of Middle River and Anthony Carlson of Holt. The Carlsons also hold controlling interest in the Marshall County State Bank at Holt.—Warren Sheaf.

Governor Langer Dies Hard

William Langer, governor of North Dakota, was ousted from office Tuesday by the Supreme Court of that state, after being sentenced to serve a term in the Federal Penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kansas. However, in the recent primary election, Langer received a big majority vote, showing that most of the people were behind him in spite of the fact that he was convicted of misusing Federal funds.

On Tuesday night, therefore, Langer declared martial law in Bismarck and intended to keep his office by force. He had called a special session of the Legislature. Ole H. Olson, lieutenant governor, who was sworn in as governor, declared the call for a special session null and void.

The two governors of North Dakota will now fight it out. Whether we sympathize with Langer or not, we must admit that he dies awful hard.

Two Men Die In Middle River Crash

Late Monday night, a gruesome auto accident occurred near Middle River, in which Fred W. Johnson of Crookston, salesman for Finch-Winslow-Carlyle, and J. Vogel of Fergus Falls, Diamond Match salesman, lost their lives. The two, driving separate cars, were returning from Strathcona, when Johnson, who drove ahead, stopped to look at his tires, it was said. Vogel, coming at a terrific speed behind, crashed into both Johnson and the parked car. Johnson was killed instantly. Vogel's car careened into the ditch, and Vogel died of his injuries.

Other members of the party were injured and badly shaken up, Miss Beatrice Anderson of Middle River sustaining a broken leg.

Johnson is survived by his wife and two small daughters.

The Weather

For a fortnight we have had fine haying weather, with the thermometer sizzling right up around the 100 mark at the hottest part of the day. Farmers are now in the midst of haying.

Wednesday was the hottest day we've had here this year, with most thermometers registering above the 100 mark. A good soaker Wednesday night helped take the edge off the heat, but as we go to press she's warming up again.

Kittenball

The McCormick-Deering softball team of Newfolden, which has not lost a game all season, came near losing one on the local diamond Thursday night. Holt was hitting good, and led 2 to 1 until an error in the sixth put the visitors in the lead, making the final score 4-2.

On the other hand, the game with Wylie Sunday was tied in the ninth by a 17-17 score. The Wylie boys genty broke the tie by running in 7 scores in their half, holding the Holt boys scoreless in the other half.

Only half of the regular Holt team played, Bill Davis and Clarence Doran being injured, the rest absent. Several errors and home runs featured the game.

The Reason Why

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

Old Francois had taken long in reaching the fire fighters and delivering Steve's note. His crippled foot bothered him, and so it was late, indeed, when he reached the men who guarded the fire line.

It was well after midnight before two canoes began their dash up the Good-Bye.

LaFane, in the bow of the first, stepped ashore at the Mad Woman trail. The battery of flashlights gave sufficient light for them to read the sign left there.

"Down . . . both of 'em," said LaFane, at the forking of the trail.

Any other would have believed so, too. The tracks of both men and the girl they followed took the right-hand fork and, with their faith so firm in the one who had led them all summer, it did not occur to them to search for further indications.

"It sure looks as if they went down river," LaFane repeated. "But we may be wrong. "You,"—to a strapping young woodsman—"take the trail back to the Good-Bye and bring two canoes with plenty grub over here to wait for orders."

"Who'll go with you?" Young Jim asked. His voice was strained and his lips twitched in suspense.

LaFane said promptly:

"Wartin and I. You and Mac scout the lake. If you find anything that looks hot, follow it. If there's no sign, come back here. We'll get word up if we need help below."

And so Young Jim Flynn entered the lake from which LaFane had dragged him a fortnight before, eyes scanning the near shore and the islands beyond.

Soon rain began to fall in a fine, persistent drizzle, restricting their range of vision. They went slowly, following the eastern shore line.

"What's that yonder?" Young Jim asked some time later, pointing with his paddle.

"Looks like a canoe." They headed on it and as they drew near old Mac said starkly: "'Y G—d, 'tis a canoe!"

They went swiftly after the craft.

"It's Young Jim's!" McNally said sharply, not yet knowing the strange tangle of names which had concealed identities from him and all the others except LaFane.

"Look!" cried the boy. "Isn't that a bullet hole?"

"One . . . two . . . Why, three of 'em!"

For a moment they stared at one another, mutely questioning.

"He caught up with them!" the boy said huskily. "He caught up and there was shooting and . . . God knows what else!"

"All we know is that they're up ahead, son! We got no time to lose. No use proddin' around here any more. After murder, theft and, anyhow, more shootin' and whatever happened to Katie, he'll make tracks up country, if he's able. He won't be around here. Our only chance is to find where he leaves the upper river."

They began to paddle desperately.

CHAPTER XIII

The first drop of rain falling on her cheek forced Kate Flynn to a decision. To remove the pressure of her thumbs from that bandage might permit the blood to flow again; to leave this unconscious, weakened man exposed to a soaking might take away his last chance of ultimate survival.

Slowly, she relaxed the pressure she had held on the wound and anxiously watched the edges of that clotted gauze. No fresh flow appeared. The bleeding was stopped for the interval.

She hastened to the canoe and threw the duffle ashore. A tent was there, of balloon silk, packed in its bag. Swiftly she shook out the shelter and set it up over the spot where Steve lay.

She had the tent up before the rain became more than scattered drops. The clot over the wound still held. That was something to be thankful for but although she had accomplished that much she needed help.

She ran into the timber, gathering fuel, and heaped it in three piles along the beach, fifty paces apart, and, with matches found in Franz's pack, ignited her fires.

Three smokes, three shots; these are to the woodsman what the S O S is to the mariner.

The fires, however, must burn continually, they must be fed, and with green wood, which would throw out dense smoke, but as she hurried back toward the canoe for a hand-ax she saw one of Steve's knees double and straighten again in a spasmodic movement.

She prayed again when she saw blood oozing from the wound. She watched the rain beat out her fires and did not dare leave off the task of holding that bandage tight. She just sat there and pressed her hands down on the bandage and watched the mists come down from the hills and blot out horizons. When the hard driven canoe passed her island, though it was within easy rifle shot, she had no indication of the nearness of friends.

The hours dragged on. For an interminable interval Kate Flynn sat holding the bandage firmly against Drake's side and then, as the mists gave way to a steady rain, he commenced to mutter and to stir again.

"Does it hurt?" she asked. No answer. "Do you hear me? Does it hurt much now?"

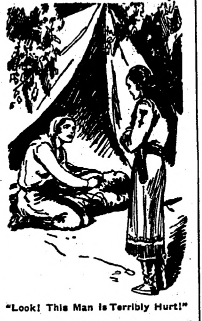
A mumble came from his lips, her own name, spoken so clearly and sharply that the girl started.

"Yes, I'm here! It's Kate, here with you!"

His eyes opened and stared at her blankly.

"It's all right," she said. "The bleeding has stopped. Please lie still so it won't start in again. Do you understand that?"

His lids fluttered closed but he lay still. Whether he had understood or not she could not know. He had locked his fingers about her small wrist and would not let go. After a time she tried to disengage his clasp so she might start the fire going, but he clung the tighter and murmured thickly. It was not until nearly dusk that she could unlock his fingers and slip away without rousing him.



"Look! This Man Is Terribly Hurt!"

She dragged driftwood from the beach and made a pile of it behind the fire which served the double purpose of throwing heat into the open front of the tent and drying fuel for the night hours. Then she resumed her vigil beside the unconscious figure, determined to fight sleep with all the resources at her command.

So it was that Mary Wolf, paddling her light canoe through the steady rain, saw a point of warm light shining through the darkness.

This might be Franz, come to look for her despite Young Jim's command that he let her alone.

She went on, proceeding with utmost caution. But she wanted to know who was there. If it were Franz, she would not be forced to keep a watch for him afterward.

She thought she heard a sound, an odd noise which she could not identify, and as she was about to pass a point of the island which would screen the fire from her that sound recurred. She arrested all movement. That was strange. Another woman, crying here in a camp. . . .

So the Indian girl came upon Kate Flynn, kneeling at Steve's side, begging him to speak, to make some sign that he was aware of her being there.

Her words covered the small sounds of Mary's approach through the rushes and it was not until the new arrival's shadow fell across Steve's figure that Kate started up, alarm and relief mingled in her heart.

"Oh!" she cried. "Oh, you've come! . . . Look! This man is terribly hurt! He was stabbed and has bled most of his life out!"

Mary appeared to give no heed. She stood bent over, hands crossed on her breast, eyes fast on Drake's drawn face.

"Where he hurt?" she asked and Kate drew back the blankets to reveal the ugly patch on Drake's bared body.

"See? It doesn't bleed any more. I held it tight for hours until it stopped. Oh, what else can be done?"

The Indian girl then did a strange thing. She knelt quickly and took one of Drake's hands in both hers.

"Yo'ng Jim!" she called softly. "Yo'ng Jim!" Her voice husked. "Yo'ng Jim, you all right?"

She held her breath for answer but none came, no indicating movement or change of expression, even. She turned a tragic face to the white girl who swayed away from her with something like shock as Franz's lying words came back to her. A squaw man, he had said this man was, and here was a young squaw, a stricken expression in her eyes. . . . The thought that this man, who had worked for her, perhaps was now dying for her and who, only a few hours ago, had kissed her, might be the lover of this dusky girl wrenched and tugged at something deep in her heart.

"He say no-thing," Mary whispered. "He won't say no-thing!" She bent her body low, cheek close to Drake's face and Kate started to turn her head away but when she saw that the movement was not in caress but in query she checked the gesture of aversion. "He breathing," Mary said. "He not hot. May-be . . ."

She turned to the scattered packs beyond the fire, dumping their contents to the ground, opening a grub sack, exploring its contents.

"Yes," she muttered and poured coffee into a kettle, running into the reeds for clean water.

Deftly, she raked coals from the fire and put the kettle on to boil. Then, without a word of explanation, disappeared into the timber. In a few moments she returned with a wad of pitch on a curl of birch bark. This she put to heat on a pan cover, went to her own canoe and returned with a bundle from which she extracted a piece of white cloth, tore the cloth into ribbons and then, testing the consistency of the softening pitch with great care, brought her materials into the tent and drawing back the blankets set to work to bind the clotted gauze firmly into place.

She smeared pitch on the flesh, pressed an end of cloth into it, carried the cloth over the bandage and pitched it down on the other side. Over and over, first this way, then that, she drew the adhering cloth fragments until the chance of breaking the clot by movement was slight.

By then the coffee had boiled. She fetched the kettle within and, a spoonful at a time, dropped the hot fluid into Drake's mouth, persisting until he had swallowed several times.

"Coffee. No whisky," she said briefly and sat back on one hip. "He not bleed now. Coffee make him strong."

"But he must have help. Some one who knows all about injured people must be brought here or he may die."

Mary nodded.

"And I can't go!" Kate cried. "I couldn't get back to headquarters. I couldn't carry a canoe across that trail. You can, can't you? You go for help."

"May-be. Not now. He is not hot. Maybe I go sometime. He needs me now. He is my friend."

"Friend?" A tightness came into Kate's tone as a wonder which was almost alarm asserted itself when the word caused her once again to think of the possible relationship of these two.

"He your brother? I see you once. You are Ol' Jim's girl. I know. This,"—with a gesture—"Yo'ng Jim, he is my friend."

She was silent a moment, struggling against things, wanting to speak, not knowing just how.

"Me, I got no brother. I got nobody. Yo'ng Jim was good to me. He made Franz let me come here. He tol' Franz to leave me be. Franz . . . I Franz's girl long time. I say to Yo'ng Jim I be his girl. Wash, Cook. He tell me no. He tell me go to school. He is my friend," she repeated simply, as though it explained everything, and in the words was an inflection, a quality which made Kate Flynn know that Franz had lied.

A low moan came from Steve just then, which checked the many questions Kate wanted to ask. After a moment his brows furrowed and he uttered a weak, inarticulate word. Then, as if the effort of that had wearied him beyond measure, he let breath slip from his lungs and turned his head to one side.

Silently Mary moved away and replenished the fire. She heated the coffee again and forced more of it into Drake's mouth.

Throughout this interval Steve was strangely aware of voices near him. They came to his consciousness, however, as from a great distance, rushing nearer, retreating as rapidly, all but fading out, then coming close again. He fought against an overpowering weakness, a terrible lethargy. He was in pain somewhere. Yet there was something he had to say . . . something he must say . . . something on which more than his own life depended. . . .

He could not remember what this was. For a time, he was at peace. Yes, more than at peace. He had a feeling of wonderful happiness. He was happier than he had ever been in his life. Some one he had always wanted to see was at hand; some voice he had hungered and thirsted to hear was in his ears. . . . Then things, even happiness, faded out, and after another incalculable interval he was aware of fretting again.

Home Rule on Isle of Man

The Isle of Man has its own unique form of home rule. No act of the British parliament applies to the island unless expressly so stated in the law. The court of Tynwald, one of the oldest legislative assemblies in the world, consists of a lieutenant governor appointed by the crown, and two chambers, the council and the house of keys. The 24 members of the latter are elected by popular vote, in which women share equal rights with men. All measures must pass both council and keys, and receive approval from the sovereign.

PANAMA NOW A RACIAL MELTING POT OF WORLD

Panama is one of the infants among the republics of the western hemisphere, both in area and age, according to a bulletin issued by the National Geographic society.

"Columbus cruised in Panamanian bays on his fourth voyage in search of a short cut from Europe to Cathay," says the bulletin. "Balboa chose to cross this lean neck of land to discover the Pacific ocean. Later it enjoyed high rank among the leading Spanish colonies of the world because rich colonists on the west coast of South America preferred to transfer across it rather than to 'double' Cape Horn as a part of a commercial route to Europe; but Panama's outstanding era of economic and political advancement has been since 1903, when the area changed from a department of Columbia to an independent state.

"Shaped like a crawling caterpillar, with its head touching Costa Rica on the north and its tail reaching southward to the forested mountains of Colombia, Panama is well known to few people beyond its borders because its fame is overshadowed by the importance to the world of the Panama canal and the Panama Canal zone. The canal zone, however, is merely a ten-mile-wide strip across the isthmus, while the republic covers an area equal to that of the state of Maine.

"Panama's population centers have become racial melting pots. On the streets of the capital, the American traveler may be jostled by men from India, China, Japan, Malasia, the East and West Indies, the South Sea islands, and nearly all the countries of Europe and South America. A recent census reported that there were some 3,000 orientals, 52,000 whites, 86,000 negroes, 33,500 Indians, and 268,000 Mestizos, in the republic."

DR. W. E. FITCH TALKS ON MINERAL WATER

Tells Why It Is Often Helpful for "Rheumatic" Aches and Pains

EUROPEAN SCIENTISTS CONFIRM OPINION

Recently William Edward Fitch, M. D., member of the International Society of Medical Hydrology and author of that comprehensive book "Mineral Waters of the United States and American Spas" spoke as follows on a program over the National Broadcasting System:

"Drinking a mineral water is not like drinking an ordinary water, for in addition to the virtues and therapeutic value of the water itself, the combined minerals, some of which are in such infinitesimal proportions as almost to defy man's limited power of analysis, produce systemic changes which affect disease profoundly. . . . In Europe, of course, mineral water treatment has been known for thousands of years, and is universally accepted. . . . I am happy to have contributed in a small way to the spread of knowledge of this form of treatment in our own great country, for here we have the same needs as Europe's population—the same diseases, the same suffering, the same problems—and bountiful Nature has provided the same form of treatment—natural American mineral waters sparkling and bubbling from the earth, ready and able to end serious and painful disease."

When we think of what Dr. Fitch has said of the real value of mineral waters—and then think how very few people can afford to travel to America's mineral water resorts—it is very important to know about Crazy Water Crystals, and the happiness they have brought to millions suffering from "rheumatic" aches and pains and other chronic ailments. Crazy Water Crystals are just precious minerals crystallized from a great natural mineral water—a type of mineral water that has built one of America's greatest health resorts, to which 150,000 people flock every year. You just mix Crazy Water Crystals with plain water, and make a great mineral water at home.

And Crazy Water Crystals are very economical. A standard sized package costs only $1.50 and is sufficient for several weeks treatment in your own home. Crazy Water Co., Mineral Wells, Texas.

MINNESOTA NEWS

St. Cloud—A new generating plant to cost $1,329,000 will be built with a PWA grant.

Hastings — Sixty-one national guardsmen from Hastings left here for a two weeks encampment at Camp Ripley.

Duluth—The war department has approved an allotment of $22,000 for the Duluth district for general examinations, surveys and contingencies.

Thief River Falls—More than 500,000 pounds of wool has been pooled and shipped from here this year, according to figures of Manager Robert J. Lund.

Hopkins—Boys set off a whole fireworks stand here and bolted the door, causing two war veterans to think they were in a new war until the explosions ceased.

Winona—A public works administration loan and grant of $298,000 for a school was changed to a grant of $84,500. The grant is 30 per cent of the cost of labor and material.

St. Paul—Uncle Sam has bought a total of 636,293 head of catte in Minnesota, North and South Dakota and Wisconsin in the campaign to relieve the drouth situation, it was announced at University Farm.

Willmar—Willmar's old curfew ordinance has been dug up and its strict enforcement in the future has been ordered. A special whistle has been placed on the municipal plant and it will be blown each day.

Crookston—Red River valley crop conditions have improved remarkably the last few weeks, making the valley as a whole the garden spot of the northwest, reports T. M. McCall of the Northwest Experimental station.

Hutchinson—Disappointed when his offer of marriage was refused, George F. Fimon, 34, farmer, shot and wounded Opal Krasen, 16, former Hutchinson girl, and then killed himself. The shooting occurred in Minneapolis.

St. Paul—The threat that St. Paul's franchise in the American Association would be removed to Peoria, Ill., was averted when President R. T. Connery and the local business men got together on a plan to boost attendance.

Jackson—Children in the Stanley Breed family escaped through a window when flames, caused by an explosion of gasoline used to start a fire in a stove, destroyed their home and all its contents. Mr. and Mrs. Breed were absent.

Minneapolis—After the case had been delayed several times, Congressman Francis Shoemaker appeared in Municipal Court and paid the $50 fine imposed upon him after he had been convicted of disorderly conduct during the truck drivers strike.

St. Paul—Appointment of Nathan Harris, engineer for the board of estimate and taxation, as state engineer and director of the work division of the state emergency relief administration was announced by L. P. Zimmerman, assistant administrator.

Minneapolis—Unable to release a long advertising sign he was towing, Frank Faulkner, veteran flier, crashed at the Wold-Chamberlain field in an autogyro. Faulkner escaped with a minor leg injury, but the gyro burst into flames and was demolished at a loss of $10,000.

Luverne—The final encampment of the Southwestern Minnesota Grand Army of the Republic probably will be conducted in Windom in 1935. Disbanding of the organization is under consideration, because of the decrease in membership and the resulting heavier financial burden for survivors.

Wheaton—For the first time in its corporate existence of more than a half century, the village of Wheaton has been assured of an adequate water supply. A new well drilled one mile east of the village is testing almost 500 gallons per minute and will produce water in sufficient quantity to care for a town 10 times its size.

Redwood Falls—The seventh district encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, with 208 delegates and alternates from 16 posts and 2,000 members and visitors in attendance, elected the following officers: District commander, John W. Lauterback, Redwood Falls; senior vicecommander, Ivar Neson, Willmar; junior vicecommander, Edgar Marcotte, Marshall; judge advocate, George Barnes, Redwood Falls; quartermaster, Christ Paulson, Tracy.

Minneapolis—Faced with a possibility of litigation over its order making military drill optional instead of compulsory, the University of Minnesota proposed to give regular credit to students taking drill. Favorable action on the proposal was voted by the university senate to encourage enrollment in the ROTC next fall. At the same time, however, it was revealed that the United States war department is considering withdrawing its military units and the land grant appropriations to the university along with a test suit to determine whether drill should be compulsory.

Savage—Some 800 transient relief workers are busily engaged in construction of permanent camps in the Minnesota river bottoms. 500 transient workers are housed in a tent city and engaged in construction of a camp a half mile west of here.

St. Paul—The Minneapolis-St. Paul sanitary district budget for 1935 was filed with the city clerk by Allen Wagner, executive secretary. Of the total needs of $3,980,660.67, Minneapolis' share will be $2,650,453.05, with the balance being charged against St. Paul.

Getting Best Out of Picnics

Suitable Clothing Is Perhaps the First Thing to Be Considered; Selection of Refreshments Also Must Be Carefully Planned.

The picnic season is here, and those who delight in life out-of-doors rejoice. In cool days the warmth of sunshine is welcome, and one can bask in it. When days are hot, there is shade from trees in fresh green foliage. And all the time there is that peculiarly delicious fragrance of the air with its flower-scented perfume.

To enjoy the picnic after it is over is of importance as well as during the pleasant hours in the open air. There should be a benefit from it. To insure this, three things are necessary. First — the preparations should not have been too tiring. Often a woman becomes so weary getting ready for the outing, that, in spite of the pleasure, she gets little or no recuperative good from it. Sometimes she is too weary even to enjoy the picnic. So don't exhaust your power of enjoyment before starting off.

Second—be dressed for the occasion. Wear simple sport clothes, avoid appearing in party frocks. They don't make you look your best, because they are unsuitable, and attention is attracted to that element critically, not to the person. Also suit your clothes to the weather. To wear garments too heavy for the temperature is uncomfortable, and those too thin are scarcely less so. In either instance colds may result. A light-weight frock with a sweater, or "woolly" as the English say, is a good combination.

Shoes with french heels are for dress occasion, not outings, so wear sport shoes with their lower and broader heels which do not prick the ground. Low common sense heels do not suit every woman's foot any more than do high heels, but if your foot takes a high heel, it should be the sport shoe type, not the french heel shape, for picnic wear.

And last in order of comment, although not in account, is the proper food. Just what this should be cannot be decided at random, for picnics vary in style. There are some at which hearty sandwiches, cookies or cake, and fruit, with cold or hot beverages, are just the thing. There are other picnics where slices of meat, buttered rolls, a salad, hot or cold beverages, ice cream and cake, fruit, etc., are desirable. Whatever the food, have enough, but not a lavish quantity. Left-over picnic food is not tempting. Remember that appetites crave main course foods rather than frills.

URGES CALLING SPADE A SPADE

Critic Sees Opportunity for Debunking Speech.

American speech needs debunking, in the opinion of Frank G. Tompkins, professor of English at the Colleges of the City of Detroit.

Professor Tompkins deplores "the tendency to use big names for little things as the result of our love of the elegant, high-sounding word to express the commonplace, work-a-day fact and our aversion to calling a spade a spade."

Too often, he believes, Americans refuse to recognize cheap and ugly things as cheap and ugly, or even commonplace. Instead, we attempt to fool ourselves and others by dressing them up in grand names.

"Consider the glittering offices we assume in our lodges," Professor Tompkins points out. "Titles like 'Grand Exalted Potentate of the Honorable and Benevolent Order of So-and-So,' or 'Her Most Imperial Majesty, the Lady Queen of the Hive.' What delusions of grandeur the resounding titles must bring while one wears the purple velveteen robe and the gold-braided hat that go with them, but once out in the cold street what a let-down to face the world as plain Maggie Smith or John Brown.

"The same love of title shows itself in the colonels and majors who earned their rank without leaving their desks, the 'professors' of phrenology and astrology, medicine show 'doctors,' barber 'colleges,' and business 'universities.'

"My neighbor does not take roomers, but for years she has had 'paying guests.' They look like roomers, just the same. Down the street is an 'obesity salon' and farther on a 'reducing shoppe.' Neither one is a salon or a shoppe.

"Is it less humiliating to wear 'dentures' than false teeth? Does an 'educator' teach better than a teacher? Are 'deferred payments' easier than buying on time?

"Why should we delude ourselves with words? Reality is there, just the same."—Detroit News.

Photographic Darkroom That Fits Vest Pocket

A safe and efficient photographic darkroom may be carried in one's vest pocket. The cumbersome darkroom so familiar to every amateur has been reduced to about the size of a pack of cigarettes. One can develop and fix any number of films in bright sunlight. The extremely compact darkroom is an ingenious little tank with a mechanical device for rolling the film through the developing and fixing solution, all, of course, in perfect darkness. The film is kept in motion by means of a crank device. An additional convenience is a thermometer-like instrument which tells the exact time required for developing and fixing at different temperatures winter and summer. The vest pocket darkroom, which has been exhibited at the Leipzig fair, does away with the drudgery of developing and makes it possible for a photographer to carry a finished film home with him. The tank is water tight and fool proof.

Private Postal System in Germany Long Ago

The first postage stamps for what is now the republic of Germany were those of the house of Thurn and Taxis, a noble family which had operated a postal system for almost 300 years. Early in the Sixteenth century this post reached from the Netherlands through Germany and Austria to Italy, but during a war in the Netherlands had fallen into disuse.

After this war when the counts of Thurn and Taxis again attempted to set up the monopoly, several of the German states which had meanwhile organized postal systems refused to recognize the grand hereditary postmaster. This was the condition of affairs when stamps were put in use to prepay mail matter.

The Thurn and Taxis post office joined the Austro-German Postal union in 1851, and, conforming to the rules of that body, issued stamps. The German states not served by Thurn and Taxis had, generally speaking, issued stamps prior to that time. There were many systems of coinage in use in the various states using the Thurn and Taxis post and it was necessary to group the states in two bodies termed the northern district and the southern district with a series of stamps for each.

A Dollar Dinner for Four

FAMILY AIR LINES

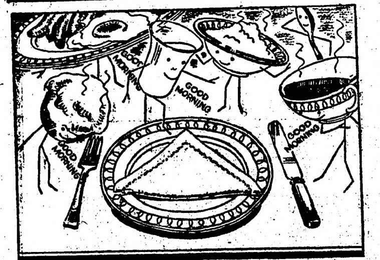
If a good beginning makes a good ending, here's a dinner which should be a great success. It "takes off" with a fruit cocktail that is new and different and comes to a "happy landing" with a hearty dessert that everyone enjoys. Twenty-five cents apiece is the cost of this meal which takes four people on a non-stop epicurean flight. Why not serve it some night soon?

Black Cherry and Rhubarb Cocktail 20¢
Stuffed Calf Hearts 34¢
Bread and Butter 8¢
Scalloped Potatoes 10¢
Dutch Peach Cake 25¢
Demi-Tasse 3¢

Black Cherry and Rhubarb Cocktail: Add a third of a cup sugar and a fourth of a cup water to two cups diced rhubarb, and bring to boiling. Cook very gently until fruit is tender but not broken. Chill. Add contents of one 8-ounce can of pitted black cherries and the cherry syrup. Serve cold.

Dutch Peach Cake: Spread one cup of baking powder biscuit dough out thin in a buttered pan. Spread the contents of one No. 1 can of sliced peaches over the dough, pressing them down into the mixture. Sprinkle with half a cup sugar and half a teaspoon cinnamon. Dot with two tablespoons butter. Bake in a 350 degree oven for about thirty minutes. Serve warm with top milk or thin cream.*

Better Breakfasts



What a cheerful sight for recently-opened eyes — a platter of sausages with a border of yellow fried eggs and red slices of fresh tomato! While the coffee is purring in the percolator, the sausages are sputtering importantly in the pan and it is likely that there will be purrs of pleasure and sputters of excitement when you proudly set the dish on the breakfast table. Here is the menu for a breakfast like that.

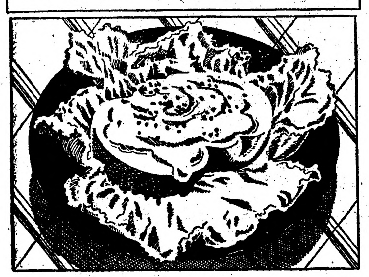
Orange and Grapefruit Juice
Cereal with Cream
Fried Eggs Sausages
Sliced Tomatoes
Toasted Rolls or Muffins
Coffee

Sausages and Fried Eggs: Remove the contents from one 8-ounce can of pure pork sausages, melt a little of the fat from the can, and fry the sausages in it. When done, remove the sausages and fry three eggs in this fat, adding more if needed. There are usually thirteen sausages in a can. This serves three, possibly four.

Fresh Coffee Makes Good Coffee

To make the kind of coffee that wins loud approval from all the family, use heaping tablespoons of coffee, one for each person and one for the pot. Thanks to the vacuum packing of coffee, stale, bitter coffee has been banished from modern homes. Vacuum cans keep air, the arch-enemy of coffee flavor, away from it and at the same time keep all its fragrant oils in.*

A $1.00 Dinner for 4



The salad is the gipsy of the menu. While the other courses hold rigidly to their conventional order of appearance, the salad roams around, sometimes entering at the beginning of dinner, sometimes as a main dish, and sometimes as a dessert. In this menu, it comes last, ending the dinner with serene charm. And what a dinner this is—considering the fact that it serves four people at a cost of only twenty-five cents apiece!

Beef Liver with Mushrooms 45¢
Hashed Brown Potatoes 8¢
Cole Slaw 8¢
Bread and Butter 8¢
Ginger Peach Salad 28¢
Demi-Tasse 3¢

Beef Liver with Mushrooms: Cover three-quarters of a pound of liver with boiling water. Let stand a minute. Drain. Remove skin and blood vessels. Salt and pepper, and roll in flour. Sauté in bacon drippings till tender. Remove liver to platter, and to the fat in the skillet add the contents of one 4-ounce can of mushrooms (sliced) and cook for a few minutes. Add mushroom liquor and a third of a cup of milk, and stir until smooth. Season and pour over the liver.

Ginger Peach Salad: Drain half the contents of one No. 2½ can of peach halves and lay them in lettuce leaves on salad plates. Mash one cream cheese, add two tablespoons mayonnaise, and cream together. Crumble three gingersnaps and mix in carefully. Pile this mixture on top of the peaches, and chill. Garnish with mayonnaise.*

A band of gypsies, traveling in a big car, were blamed for a series of robberies near Newfolden last week. They passed thru here on high Friday night, headed south; but telephone calls to the police department of our neighbor city to the south failed to connect, so the robbers disappeared in a cloud of gas smoke.

Views and Reviews

[The views below do not necessarily coincide with the official beliefs of this publication; they are merely personal observations.]

What is a radical?

It is what approximately 98 per cent of the people of the U. S. A. are not.

The general opinion of a radical is one who is absolutely wrong. (As a matter of fact, a radical is generally termed "left," as distinguished from the reform wing, called "right.") The dictionary says that the adjective "radical" means "coming from the root," or fundamental. Nothing is said about "wrong" or "right."

A radical in politics is one who desires sweeping changes in the order of things. For years, the radical has told us what was going to happen to our economic system. We laughed at him. Today, everything he said would happen has happened.

Now Roosevelt and his Brain Trust are toying with radical ideas, after having tried semi-radical ones with small success. As someone once said, the laugh is now on the other foot.

Then, a person may be radical in some things and conservative in others. If a person proves the soundness of his viewpoint to the world, he is a "great man." If unsuccessful in proving his own peculiar truth, he is a "nut."

Christofo Colombo, do bigga banan' man (wh re-discovered America after the Norwegians had run across it, then forgot about it)—Columbus was a radical of a sort. He believed in the revolutionary idea that the earth was globe-shaped, and not flat like a plate. He died without having proved his point, in poverty and chains.

I'm conservative, for instance, wherever eats are concerned. A very, very learned professor recently remarked that there was enough food value in a peanut to keep a brain worker going for 14 hours. That may be, but my brain seems to work better when my stomach is off my mind and comfortably padded with three or four squares a day (in round numbers). I have a sympathy for vegetarians, fruitarians, and other radical eaters. Look at the juicy pork chops, hamburgers, and fresh fried fish they are missing! Curiously enough, the hungrier and more poverty-stricken a person becomes, the more radical he becomes. The Russian revolution was precipitated because men wanted bread. War and peace originate in the stomach. —B.C.H.

"Hebrews 13:8"!!

(Quoted from the Holt Weekly News of 20 Years Ago.)

"When you finish looking over the paper this week and throw it down in disgust because there is nothing in it and then cuss the editor for his lack in furnishing you local news as he is supposed to do, just stop to think of the matters of interest you could have written about. Perhaps there were many interesting events transpiring the past week but if there has been it is impossible to find out about them. We have buttonholed everyone we met and begged and pleaded for news items only to be told that "there's nothing doing." Farmers are too busy to come to town, merchants are sitting around rejoicing that the farmers are busy, knowing that it means good times in the fall, and other citizens are trying to keep cool. There is only one birth to record, and it is too hot for anybody to get married or divorced. Social activities are at a standstill and everything is so dull that a dog fight would be of interest."

Little Ones Trampled by Horse

A corrected and more complete version of the mad horse incident at the Oscar Gutterude farm, is taken from the Thief River Falls Times:

"A tragedy occurred last Friday in the Oscar Gutterude home when their two little boys were hurt by an angry horse. It is thought that Elmer, a toddler of one year, had gotten into the pasture, and three year old Lawrence went after him when the horse attacked. Mrs. Gutterude, who was in the house, attracted by the horse's squeals of rage, frightened it away with sticks. Both little fellows were unconscious when found, the older boy lying on top of his brother as if tring to protect him, and thus bearing the most savage blows. Both boys were taken to the hospital. The youngest one was not hurt except for a few bruises but small hope is held for Lawrence's recovery, several bones in his neck, one arm and one leg being broken, and his little body bruised and cut."

Later reports are that there is a chance for his recovery.

Dillinger Meets His Kismet

John (Wooden Gun) Dillinger is no more. He was shot and killed Sunday night by a squad of plain clothes men armed with rifles and six-shooters, outside of a theatre in north Chicago. The police were tipped off as to the desperado's whereabouts; he had been lured to the theatre by "a girl in a red dress" whose identity remained unknown. The motive for the tipoff was undoubtedly the $10,000 reward offered.

Some farmers have harvested their winter rye already. Other grain is also ripening, having been hastened by the recent hot spell.

Dr. O. G. Lynde of Thief River Falls had a narrow escape from death Sunday night last week when he was returning from a call at Wylie. He went to sleep at the wheel and his car turned over in the ditch, knocking him unconscious. Regaining consciousness, he managed to work his way loose from the car, and walked to a nearby farm. Luckily, his only injury was a gash on the jaw.

Da Bare Canary

Quite a few people saw the Baer-Carnera fight picture here Thursday. Some would have awarded the bout to the big Italian on points, as Baer kept backing away from him, committed a lot of what looked like fouls, and in general showed very poor form. However, Carnera broke his ankle in the second round, when he was knocked for a loop. This knockdown, and those in the tenth and eleventh rounds prompted the referee to award Baer a technical knockout.

Boy Burned in Car

A sad accident occurred at Thief River Falls Tuesday when Dale Borchert, three and a half year old son of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Borchert of Thief River Falls, was burned to death. He had been playing with matches in his father's car, and set fire to the upholstery. He was dead when rescuers removed him from the car.

Had Bad Arm

Roy Rustad had the misfortune last week to get poison in one of his arms. He was forced to quit work, on the John Berget farm, and go to a hospital in Thief River Falls for treatment. He returned home this week and is now getting along fine.

Nazis Assassinate Dollfuss of Austria

A group of 144 Nazis attempted to sieze power in Austria on Wednesday by raiding and capturing the chancellory and killing Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss, bitter enemy of Naziism. After the killing, the Nazis negotiated for safe transportation to Germany, in return for abandoning the chancellory.

Apprehension was felt in all European capitals that this event might lead to war.

The Reason Why - -

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

"Franz!" some one said in a thick, unnatural voice, and he realized that he himself had spoken the name. "Franz, I'll . . . I'll let you go if you'll give her back!"

"Yes," a voice answered. Not Franz's voice; that other voice. "Yes, I'm back. It's all right. I'm here. What is it?"

He found himself staring into that face, a face now bathed in the soft warm light of a snapping fire.

"Oh," he said and closed his eyes and smiled. So she was all right, then. "All . . . right," he whispered.

Then something was pressed to his lips.

"It is hot," a voice said. That must be Mary's voice. Where did she come from? . . . A hand raised his head gently and he felt strong coffee scorch his lips. He sipped obediently and dropped back. This was strange. . . . He was alone with two girls, and had a job before him. . . . A man with things he must do who can't remember what they are can't be alone with women. . . .

He stirred, trying to sit up, and Kate's voice begged him to lie quiet.

"All right," he murmured. If she wanted that, then that was what she would have. . . . Lord, but she was lovely to look upon! . . .

So it came to be dawn before he looked about him with clear consciousness. At his feet sat Mary, her eyes fast on him.

"Hullo," he said.

Mary gestured for caution, finger at her lips, and tilted her head toward the sleeper.

"Your sister," she said, leaning close. "She tired."

"Sister? What's that—"

Kate roused, her movement cutting off his words.

"Oh!" she gasped as she saw the clarity in his countenance. "Oh, how do you feel? Are you stronger, now?"

"Strong? Not very." He smiled slightly. "But what's all the fuss? What went on? How'd we all—

"Oh, God!" he moaned as memory of what had happened and what might yet happen flooded back. "What day's this?"

"It doesn't matter," Kate said soothingly, coming close to him. "So long as you're feeling better, it doesn't matter—"

"Matter? Of course, it matters. Think! What has happened. . . . I got in Tuesday and all day yesterday—

"That's it! I remember, now . . . . All right, if you say so I won't sit up. But listen. I'm giddy as the devil. Things are going round outside but I'm thinking straight. Today at four o'clock that money's got to be in MacDonald's hands or Polaris is sunk. I remember, now. . . . Franz nicked me with a knife. D' I stay out all this time? Whew! Say, we've got to snap into it?"

"But you mustn't think of things like that," Kate protested as one would talk to a petulant child. "It makes no difference what happens to Polaris until you're all right."

"Me!" he scoffed feebly. "I'm all right except for being helpless. I must 've lost a lot of blood. I'm weak as . . . as something. But I guess I got weak trying to arrange things for you Flynns. I can't fall down on the job with the finish in sight. Where are the boys?"

"I haven't seen a soul except Mary, here, since you overtook Franz and me yesterday morning," said Kate.

Steve groaned.

"I sent word. Something slipped. . . . I wonder . . ." He shut his eyes tightly and, opening them, stared at the Indian girl a long interval.

"Mary, you ever been through the country between here and MacDonald's?"

"Oh, yes."—idly.

"How long would it take you to get there?"

"Long ways. May-be all day."

"It'd take you more than all day to go by canoe, that's certain. Listen, Mary, once you wanted to do something for me and were honest about it. Well, now's your chance. There's something I've got to have done today that's more important than anything I've ever tried to do in my life. . . . Except one thing, of course."—with a grave smile at Kate. "Understand that? Good.

"I've got something to send to MacDonald. Will you take a package to him across country and get there before four o'clock today?"

The girl squinted at the sun and shrugged slightly.

"May-be. I go fast all time."

He tried to move and turned his face helplessly to Kate.

"I'm stiff as a board. In my hip pocket is a note-book and pencil. No; no. . . Other one. . . . Yes, that's it. Now, write out a receipt for the Laird to sign. That option's binding. All we've got to do is fulfill its terms. Get the dates straight in your head, and make the receipt an acknowledgment of the initial payment on the option recorded in this county as of such-and-such a date. Good, now!"—as the girl began to write.

After a moment she read it to him; he suggested a change and then gave the document his approval.

"That'll hold him," he said excitedly, color beginning to stain his cheeks. "Now, where's the brief case? Used it for a pillow, eh? Good!" he grinned. "But you can trust Mary."

He shifted his gaze to the waiting Indian girl.

"You get to MacDonald's before four o'clock this afternoon. You give the bag to him and tell him to write his name on this paper. Then you take the paper to headquarters and give it to . . . to Mrs. LaFane. She'll be there, surely. You wait for me there and you'll have your reward or the stars'll fall!"

"Sure, Yo'ng Jim. . . . Good-by," she said, and tucking the receipt into her blouse, took the brief case and turned to her canoe.

Steve was in a sweat by that time. Every pore seemed to be open, letting his meager store of strength gush from his weary body. He breathed quickly and shielded his eyes from the brilliant sunlight.

"No good!" he whispered after a moment. "I'm all in. . . . But she'll get there. I'd bet on that girl . . ."

"Don't talk, please," urged Kate, drawing the blankets about his shoulders. "It's nothing to worry about. Compared to other things that have happened it's a detail."

She rose and went to the fire.

"Here's a broth made of smoked meat and meal," she said. "Take it now, and then more coffee. Mary said it was the thing to do. She knows. I felt so helpless. . . ."

Obediently he sipped from the cups she held for him, his head held against her side, and after that he slept for a time. It was a deep sleep. He was conscious of the girl's presence all the time and when he finally roused she was standing under the fly looking down at him. He smiled weakly.

"More to eat?"

"If it's from your hand," he answered.

He was definitely better by then, but still events and people were tangled in his mind.

"Things are all jimmied up," he confessed. "Of course, I remember getting shot at. Was that right here? Was, eh? . . . And I recall about Franz trying to get away and knifing me and then drowning. But after that it's . . . it's kind of like a photograph out of focus. Fuzzy. How'd Mary get here, for instance?"

The girl sat cross-legged beside him and told all that had transpired during his period of unconsciousness.

"And you all alone!" he murmured. "Holding my life inside my body with your hands." He looked at her hands "They're so small," he said. "I . . . I've wondered about your hands. I . . . I've wondered a lot about you. Why, a girl like you all alone and thinking you had a dying stranger along!"

"Not a stranger," she said gently. "It was hard, but chiefly because I felt I owed so much to you."

He experienced an odd embarrassment at such pointedly personal talk. He was not strong enough for that yet, he found.

"Nobody showed up. I'll bet they went down river. I was so . . . so up in the air that I never left any warning at the landing."

She told him of her futile attempts to send up smokes.

"Rain, eh? That explains it! Chances are some of 'em went right by us yesterday and never guessed we were so near. It's clear as a bell now and there's no wind. Hadn't we better try the smoke signal again?"

"Certainly! I'll get the fires going, now."

"Wish I could help. You're no girl to be lugging fire wood for a big hulk like me."

"If you never help another person in all your life, and if you live to be older than the hills, you've done your share," she said soberly and turned away to gather wood and hide the emotion in her eyes.

When the fires were going she returned to his side. For an interval she spoke no word and then, when he smiled inquiringly, she asked:

"Those," He Said, "Are the Sweetest Words I've Ever Heard."

"Who are you?"

"I'm Steve Drake. I knew your dad when I was a kid. . . . Kind of a rotten deal, pulling wool over your eyes the way I did. But . . . I'll tell you how it was."

He went back to that day when Old Jim Flynn saved him and his father from perishing in a blizzard. He told it all, just as it had happened, from that time on. Kate did not interrupt. When he spoke of Franz, she lost color; when he told of his maneuvering with the Laird her lips parted in eagerness; when he narrated how LaFane had handled Young Jim tears came into her eyes.

Breaks marked the story, of course; twice she made him stop and sip food and stimulant.

"You're still weak," she said. "May-be you're weaker than I think. Oh, some one must come before long!"

"Well, that's it," he finally ended. "I've been an imposter, but it seemed to be the only way. If you'd have known about the kid before he got straightened out, you'd have been frantic; if the men realized I was a stranger, they never would have stuck to the job. Now, if Mary gets to the Laird's on time, we're set. If not . . ."

"If not, then it never can be said that a brave fight wasn't made! I . . . What can I say to you, Steve Drake? Words are so empty. All I can say, I guess, is to echo the words of Mary Wolf: You are my friend."

"Those," he said, "are the sweetest words I've ever heard."

She surrendered her hand when he reached for it and he gripped it close.

CHAPTER XIV

It was Young Jim himself who sighted the three smokes. He and McNally hastened toward the island and within minutes of their arrival the older man was on his way down the lake with plenty of orders for the detachment of men he would surely find there.

"Doctor!" Steve snorted when Kate gave her first instruction. "I should say not! Why, I'll be good as new tomorrow. I'll take it easy and go out with the boys."

He would do no such thing, Kate insisted firmly. He would stay in this very spot until a doctor gave him permission to move.

And so a larger tent was brought in before night and more blankets and an abundance of food. Young Jim and Kate stayed with him and between Steve's rest periods the talk flowed almost constantly.

Late the next day the doctor appeared. He looked Steve over carefully, re-dressed the wound and questioned and prodded.

"In a day or two," he said. "You keep quiet here for a day or two and then you can go out safely."

"Good Lord! You mean I've got to be babied and waited on when I feel fit as a fiddle?"

"Safer that way," the doctor asserted.

LaFane stepped close to the bed, then. He had brought the doctor and carried news of Mary as well. She had made the trip through the timber successfully and with half an hour to spare had reached MacDonald's. The old Scot, having no other course, had signed the receipt and accepted the money.

"But he didn't want to do it," LaFane added. "He's pretty mad. He says you're a good fisherman and a good liar. If Mary hadn't gotten there on time he'd never have gone through with the deal."

"I'll have to make my peace with him when I'm permitted to do as I please again! He's a nice old codger and I'd hate to leave the country with him feeling this way."

LaFane and the doctor moved down to the beach, leaving Young Jim and Kate in Steve's tent.

"Leave the country?" the girl asked. "What do you mean by that?"

Her brother looked sharply at her, catching a repressed quality in the tone.

"Why, what'd I stay here for?" Steve countered. "The actual, real, certified Young Jim's all set to go. I don't aim to stick around here and ask the Flynns to make room for me."

"Ask them?" she cried. "Why . . . when . . . Don't you see . . ."

Her voice choked up and her eyes misted.

Steve looked at Young Jim and at the girl, and then turned his head away.

"Gosh," the boy said, "we'll be needing you, now that it's going to be such a whale of an operation. That is, if we could get you to stay."

"Well, that's fine of you. . . . I haven't anything in particular to do. There are things . . . reasons . . . that is—" He cleared his throat as he felt color mounting into his cheeks. "What I'm trying to say is this: if you've a job of work that I can do I sure'll welcome a chance at it."

"Oh, yes; there'll be work, all right," said Kate as if her mind were on other matters. "Besides . . . you see . . ."

She, in her turn, was stammering and Young Jim, uncoiling his long legs, grinned as he rose.

"Where you going?" Steve asked.

"Mostly out of the way until you two can say some of the things that seem to be on your minds," he chuckled.

[THE END]

Holidays Observed

Holidays which are observed in every state in the Union are: New Year's day, Washington's birthday, July Fourth, Labor day, Thanksgiving day and Christmas day. These are legal or public holidays, made so by acts of legislatures in the states, by acts of congress for the District of Columbia, or by proclamation of the President. The United States congress has not the power to decide for the states the observance of any day as a national holiday.

Use That Closet Space to the Best Advantage

Boxing the closet is a term which can well be applied to the modern method of keeping closets neat and trim. To meet the requirements of such a scheme all sorts and kinds of boxes, durable yet of light weight are found in the shops. There are boxes for shoes and stockings, boxes for blouses, boxes for gloves and handkerchiefs, boxes for lingerie, and boxes for almost every conceivable thing which can be folded or laid away and kept good. The boxes mentioned are for clothes closets, but the handy containers are found excellent furnishings for other closets too. It seems a bit odd to talk of furnishing closets, but that is precisely what is done when the spaces are fitted with boxes.

Closet boxes differ from ordinary kinds, for, since they come in sectional cases, they are uncovered, and can be pulled in and out. As a matter of fact they are drawers rather than boxes, although they are customarily called boxes. The cases come in endless sizes and shapes to suit shapes and sizes of closet spaces as well as to best accommodate the contents.

In furnishing a closet with these box-drawer cases it should be remembered that they should fill nooks, and stand on shelves, and be low and out of the way of the space needed for hanging up garments. It is assumed that one or more clothes poles extend the length of the closet, or possibly its width, if the closet is deep. Either of these arrangements uses to best advantage the space area of the closet, leaving the walls free for the cases of boxes.

For those who live in rented houses or apartments it is important to have these boxes easily portable. They can be purchased in sections, sometimes so planned that they can occupy a long, low space, when resting on one side, or a high, narrow one when standing on end. In each instance the drawers fit into place correctly merely by putting them in to suit the positioning of the case.

The boxes and cases may all be of extra heavy cardboard. Or they may have the cases of wood and drawers of the durable processed paper. The finish may be fancy paper or paint, or both may be used on one case when made of both wood and paper. Colors come in such wide variety that any preferred color scheme can be followed in the closet to suit the room from which it opens.

The orderliness that pervades closets trimly furnished with these boxes is refreshing. This is particularly noticeable in a place of the store closet sort, in which ribbons and laces, notions and the usual array of necessary oddments must be kept. By labeling the box-drawers all items can be found without searching, and valuable time is saved.

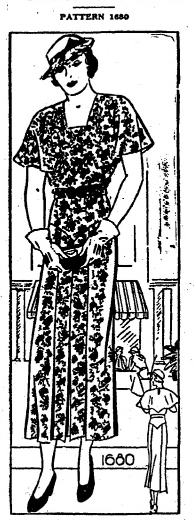
CAPE FLATTERING TO THE LARGER FIGURE

PATTERN 1680



According to latest fashion dictates the frock with the large cape is very popular during the warm weather season. Today's model is particularly flattering to the larger figure, for its deep, gracefully flared cape conceals a full bust and stout arms. Pointed seamings and length-giving skirt pleats achieve an illusion of slenderness. A printed silk, or one of the new sheers, would be loveliest for it. The cape may be contrasting, if desired. You'll never need worry about what to wear, when you can slip into this frock and look your smartest—for any occasion.

Pattern 1680 is available in sizes 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 takes 4⅛ yards, 39-inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly your name, address and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address [illegible] Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 243 West Seventeenth Street, New York City.

Columbus Pictured as Big and Freckled Faced

Christopher Columbus was a "brave, big man with a long, red, freckled face."

Such was the description of the discoverer of America in one of the first printed accounts of his discoveries—"The New World," by Michael Herr, published at Strassburg in 1534—which has just come to light in the collection of old scientific books in the Smithsonian Institution's library. Herr's accounts are quite naive. Thus he relates the Columbus story:

"He had good hopes that he could discover before sundown several islands which would be of great pleasure and use to the people. With regard to those islands that lay in front of India, he himself expected to find costly pearls and all sorts of precious stones; also spices and much gold. The king and queen made fun of him as a man who was engaged in a foolish task and let the thing go as a good joke. At last after eight years had gone by and Christopher continued to beseech the king, the king began to take the proposition a little more to heart and undertook to find out what was back of that man and why he stuck to his proposition. Then the king commanded that a galley be outfitted, and he also supplied two swift ships with provisions and whatever else was necessary. When these ships were ready Columbus sailed from the Spanish coast on the first day of the autumn month, in the year after the birth of Christ 1492, and thus went on his long-desired journey."

After leaving the Canaries, which were infested with cannibals, Herr relates, Columbus "sailed for thirty-three days and nights steadily toward the setting sun and saw no land. At last he saw while on watch an island, and as he came closer he saw six islands, two large ones. One of these he called Hispana and the other he called Johanna. They have never been able to determine definitely whether the island Johanna was an island or not. Still as they sailed along the coast they heard many birds sing, especially nightingales, which lived in the thick forests in the winter. They also saw much fresh water there which was pleasant to drink, and many large and beautiful ports as they sailed with the northwest wind. After they had sailed 800 miles and still found no end they thought it to be a part of a continent. Therefore they considered to retrace their journey. To this the storms contributed, for the masts began to loosen. Therefore, Columbus commanded the ship to be turned in the direction of the rising sun. Thus they came soon to the island which they named Hispana and there they explored the land diligently.

"Then toward midnight as they neared a cape the large ship struck a rock so that it went apart. The boat could not sink, however, because the stone was so flat. Quickly they transshipped to another boat and saved their companions who were now half dead. But when they reached the land and saw the inhabitants, the latter fled quickly into the thick forest, just like when a dog chases a rabbit."—Smithsonian Institution Bulletin.

NO GOOD REASON FOR PESSIMISM

F. M. Law, President American Bankers Association, Sees Improving Conditions and a Changing Future

WASHINGTON, D. C.—There is no good reason for pessimism today, for though the "depression is not by any means over we are coming out of it," F. M. Law, President of the American Bankers Association told the American Institute of Banking convention here recently.

"Banking is a necessary business and will endure," Mr. Law said. "In order to endure, it must be the right sort of banking, under the right sort of management.

"The American Institute of Banking commands and is entitled to great respect because its major objective is to teach and promote the right kind of banking. One of the chief reasons for my faith in the future of banking is that this organization has 219 active chapters, with over 50,000 members, and with 33,000 students enrolled, and it is doing a good job in teaching these thousands of bank employees what good banking is, and what it is not."

Business Men Should Recognize New Conditions

Business men everywhere, and especially bankers, he said, will do well to recognize and to understand the many changes that are occurring, for "it is fatal to be obsessed with the belief that any and all change from the existing order is heresy."

Banking is a serious business, he said and "I know not one single man or woman who has made a success of it who has not been over a long period of years a hard worker." He added:

"Take for your motto the old German phrase 'Ich Dien.' (I serve). Meaning what? Serve your depositors, your stockholders and society.

"Let no man tell you that private initiative is dead. On the contrary, it commands a greater premium today than ever before. If you and others like you have courage enough, if you possess patience, if you have a passion for hard work, and if, with an open mind, you look to and prepare for the future and the opportunities which are sure to come, you cannot be denied. Your generation will add prestige to the honorable calling that we know as banking."

Banks Repay R. F. C. Loans

Banks and trust companies on May 21, had repaid 61 per cent, or $967,959,-623.08 of the $1,581,857,085.08 in cash which they had received from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation since its establishment on February 2, 1932.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD FINDS BANKING BETTER

WASHINGTON, D. C.—A review by the Federal Reserve Board indicates that the condition of operating banks, particularly in country districts, has improved in recent months, as shown by the fact that these banks have been able to reduce their indebtedness to the reserve banks, to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and to others.

The July bulletin of the board in discussing these findings says:

"At the same time progress has been made in making available to depositors funds that had been tied up in closed banks.

"Banks in financial centres have been out of debt to the Federal Reserve Banks for a long time and in addition have had a large volume of excess reserves. At the beginning of the year there were still many small banks throughout the country, however, that carried a considerable load of indebtedness.

Country Banks Reflect Improvement

"The liquidation of indebtedness by these banks reflects in part improvement in business condition and the consequent ability of customers to repay bank loans which long had been frozen. It constitutes a strengthening of the banking position."

The board pointed out that the reduction of member bank indebtedness has been continuous since the beginning of 1932 except for a brief period during the banking crisis in the Spring of 1933. The review continued:

"In 1932 liquidation of indebtedness of member banks to the reserve banks was accompanied by an increase of their borrowings from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In the past year and a half, however, indebtedness of member banks to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has also been reduced."

SEES TURNING POINT IN BANKING HISTORY

NEW YORK. — The American Bankers Association Journal in its July issue presents the following review of banking and business conditions:

"It is an almost universal opinion among bankers that June has been the turning point in banking history in the matter of recovery. Reasons for the optimism are twofold—the condition of the banks and the prospects of better banking business.

"The reorganization of the banking system after the holiday of sixteen months ago is now practically complete. The comparatively few banks yet to be reorganized and reopened are no longer a serious factor in the situation. The year's preparatory period for the enforcement of major provisions of the Banking Act of 1933 has passed, and banks now have a definite idea of where they stand."

FAIR PLANS BIG FARM PROGRAM

Barn Dance, Rural Events Featured at Chicago Aug. 11 to 18.

Chicago.—Four million persons have entered the gates of the new World's Fair since it opened here May 26. Most of the throngs that have thrilled to the new spectacle, the new "foreign villages," which offer in themselves a "tour of the world," the new shows and the new free entertainment projects, are city dwellers. Chicagoans, visitors from other cities all over the United States and visitors from foreign countries have poured in, in large numbers.

But the real farmer-visitors' invasion of A Century of Progress has not yet begun. It will reach its peak when the Fair celebrates Farm Week, from August 11 to August 18, inclusive.

Last year Farm Week accounted for the largest single week's attendance of the entire Fair. Plans to make the celebration interesting and important to farmers are even more elaborate now than last year, according to the events division of the exposition.

WLS Barn Dance at Fair.

Saturday, August 11, will lead off the program with a massive farm parade, including bands, farm implements, machinery and equipment and farm animals. Depicting the modernization of agriculture, it will be one of the longest and most comprehensive pageants of the entire exposition.

Sunday, August 12, will see special music and farm programs interlinked with the observance of Chicago Incorporation day, with Chicago acting as host to the out-of-town multitudes.

Rexford Tugwell, assistant secretary of agriculture, has been invited to be the principal speaker of the Farm Organization day program Monday. Tuesday will be Farm Radio day, with the entire WLS "Barn Dance" presenting a program in the Court of States; 40,000 persons saw this event in 1933.

Aerial Sham Battle Planned.

The farmer's wife will have her day Wednesday, August 15, which has been named Farm Women's day, with special programs arranged to pay tribute to the women who battled to carve a nation out of the wilderness. Farm Youth day, Thursday, will be full of recognition of the future farmers of the land, with emphasis on 4-H club work.

Programs of interest to rural newspapers and magazines will feature Farm Press day, Friday. Saturday, August 18, will be farm music day, with its high spot the gigantic Chicagoland Music festival in Soldier Field, adjoining the Fair grounds. This annual event has attracted more than a half million persons in the four years of its existence. This day will also see many special contests, such as milkmaid, husband-calling and hog-calling contests.

Saturday is also Illinois day. There will be a review of 10,000 troops and demonstrations by anti-aircraft artillery units, shooting with tracer bullets at balloon targets towed by airplanes.

Farm Exhibits Are Many.

During Farm Week parties of farmers will be taken on free guided tours of the Fair grounds. Farm visitors, with only a limited time to spend, will in this way be able to see everything of vital interest to them.

Henry Ford's industrialized barn, where he shows how the farmer may, at low cost, raise soy beans, obtain the residue and process it himself, making industrial products for which he can obtain a profitable revenue, is one of the new exhibits. Another is the International Harvester company's radio-controlled tractor, which demonstrates how farming may be done from an easy chair on the veranda. Model farm homes will attract many rural sightseers, as will the exhibits of the great packing plants and the automobile manufacturers.

The Brook Hill Dairy farm, with its model farm of 1950, shows the last word in modern milk production, from cow to bottle. The International Egg Laying contest is a huge laboratory where the farmer may study the latest egg-production methods first-hand. Scores of commercial exhibitors will have displays of prime interest to Farm-Week visitors.

Special Rates Lower Cost.

Special railroad and bus rates will make it easier for the farmer to get to the Fair this summer. Automobile agencies and oil stations will give him assistance in highway travel. At the Fair, he will find costs surprisingly low. Restaurants are cheaper, transportation is cheaper, there is plentiful free entertainment and eighty per cent of all the comfort stations are free.

Probably one of the leading attractions for rural visitors will be the foreign villages, so faithful in reproductions of life and scenes in fifteen countries that they offer the equivalent of a tour of the world, right on the Fair grounds.

Farmers, Notice!

I will be thru Holt every Wednesday afternoon. If you have any work for me leave word at the Holt Cafe.

Dr. L. R. Twete, Veterinarian.

Views and Reviews

[The views below do not necessarily coincide with the official beliefs of this publication; they are merely personal observations.]

Austria is being torn to pieces by civil war between two fascist groups—the Austrian Fascists (now in power) and the rebelling Nazis. The murder of Chancellor Dollfuss, the Fascist dictator, started hostilities.

Both the Nazis and the Fascists possess a fine program, or platform, if it were ever carried out. Socialistic in origin, these platforms, used by Mussolini and Hitler, were sufficient to get the people behind them. Once in power, these men ruthlessly "purged" the party of anyone who insisted that the party should carry out its campaign promises.

Mussolini did this; Hitler imitated him in June this year.

Will fascism ever find its way to the USA? Most of us may scoff at the idea; but do you know that there is in existence right today an organization known as the Silver Shirts, who are operating right in this territory? The Ku Klux Klan is well-known; the Black Shirts, the Brown Shirts, and the Blue Shirts are lesser-known fascistic groups, who look toward Mussolini and Hitler as their model. The breakup of the Bonus Army furnished fascist material in abundance.

The first requirement for being a fascist is a deadly hate for Socialists and Communists. There is a variety of other "hates"— of Catholics, of Lutherans, of "niggers", of Jews, of Japs, of Chinks, of Bohunks, and all dark-skinned people in general; but a hatred of radicalism is a primary requisite.

Another deep-seated characteristic of all fascists is their belief in force, and discipline. All of them have characteristic uniforms, suggestive of regimentation; and all of them have absolute faith in the power of rifle and bayonet, of steel helmets and hand-grenades. With them, "Might is right."

Now, let us take a glance at socialism, which these fascists battle at every turn. The ideal behind socialism is that everyone should have the full results of his labor, and that no one man should profit at the expense of his fellowmen.

Not so long ago the Technocrats told us that if the total earnings of the 40 million wage earners and salaried workers were divided equally, the yearly salary of each one would be in excess of $10,000; with present prices of manufactured goods remaining much the same.

People are beginning to feel foolish when they are told we have too little of everything because we have too much of everything. The picture of a cotton-raiser plowing down cotton because there is too much, while he himself goes in rags, is too glaring to go unnoticed.

What's needed is a new system of distribution, with a money-system based on Work Performed. This is the idea of the Technocrats, and of radicals in general.

Is there any wonder that manufacturers should seek to combat this pernicious idea? Hitler's campaign fund was swelled by donations from numerous big manufacturers; he was able to keep his private army, the Storm Troops, on these donations.

Red-baiting is profitable, as Hitler and Mussolini have found out.—B.C.H.

Highway Projects Employ 18,000

Employment is now being provided for approximately 18,000 men by the Minnesota highway department, according to N. W. Elsberg, commissioner.

This is the season of peak activity in highway work, both in construction and maintenance. Road jobs are under way in practically every county in the state.

Nearly all the construction in progress is being paid for with federal funds granted the state last year. The grant this year is only half as large as last, which will mean a corresponding reduction in construction next season, Mr. Elsberg said. The U. S. Employment Service supervises the hiring of labor for federally financed work.

Estimating only two dependants to each workingman, the highway funds now being expended are supporting approximately 54,000 persons, or a group equal to the combined populations of St. Cloud, Rochester and Mankato.

"Money spent for highway improvements," said Mr. Elsberg, "means a saving in driving costs to motorists. It is a capital investment which will continue to pay dividends to the public for many years. At the same time, road funds create a maximum of employment spread throughout the state. The U. S. Bureau of Public Roads estimates that about 90 cents of every dollar of road expenditure goes directly or indirectly into wages and salaries."

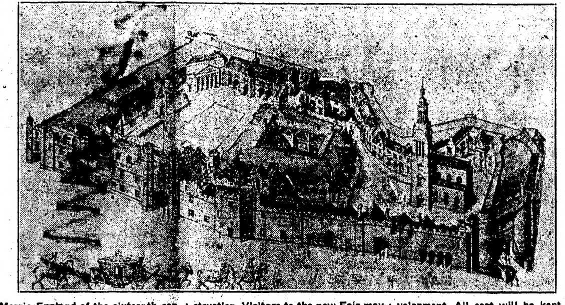
Boys Catch Freak Fish

Little Falls.—While fishing in a quarry pond east of the city two boys saw a queer looking fish which they netted and brot to J.M. Totten for identification. Mr. Totten has not identified it, however, as it apparently is a freak, and looks like a cross between a dogfish and a bullhead. It moves around rapidly in a bowl; has a fin down its back and feathers like those on a chicken, in six appendages. Its eyes are in the top of its head and it has four legs.

Drouth and North Dakota

The drouth has hit North Dakota hard. Virtually one-third of the state's entire population is on federal relief rolls. Farms are producing only miniature crops. Two hundred persons in one section are to be moved by federal authority from untillable farms. Drifting top-soil has damaged the highway system by more than $500,000. Additional thousands of persons are expected to seek relief when winter comes.—St. Paul Dispatch.

Merrie England Lives Again in New Fair



Merrie England of the sixteenth century will come to life on the "Street of Foreign Villages," a new feature of the new Chicago World's Fair which opens May 26. Many buildings famous in poetry and prose will be reproduced in this and the fourteen other foreign villages now under construction. Visitors to the new Fair may accomplish a world tour by strolling through these charming and authentic reproductions of old Europe. There will be 84 miles of free exhibits, all new and startling. Music, dancing and fireworks will be daily features in addition to exhibits of new scientific development. All cost will be kept very low. The average visitor last summer spent only $1.17 per day, inside the grounds. Week-end trips offer inexpensive and enjoyable excursions for people living within a few hundred miles of Chicago to be made by train or auto.

New Type of Boar Makes Stir

Blue Earth.—Misprinting happens even in the best of newspaper shops, and such was the case when the following ad appeared in one of the classified columns of the Blue Earth Post: "For Sale—Five Good Boars to Farrow soon. $10 each." To say that this particular publication raised a riot would be putting it mildly, in simple newspaper parlance. Why, even farmers took the trouble to stop the scribe on the street to slyly question, "Just what kinda critters is them thar boars, anyway?" Orders came in from several zoos, not to mention the scores of Universities that were anxious to get one of the unusual animals. If the Post had only a dozen of such animals, there would be no further issues and the entire force would leave for an extended trip to Honolulu or some place. But, as luck would have it, it was a mistake in the paper, and they don't happen to have a dozen of them kind of animals, and they don't know who has.

Somebody Blundered

A study of statistics reveals that a majority of the 756,500 automobile accidents in the United States in 1933 occurred on straight, dry roads in clear weather, and involved cars in good condition driven by persons with a year or more of experience. Over 75 per cent of these drivers were persons of mature age—from 25 to 64. The majority of the 30,000 deaths and 850,000 injuries must be attributed to blunders.

A recent analysis by the National Bureau of Casualty and Surety Underwriters shows what the blunders were. There were eight in all.

1. Drove too fast for conditions—this accounted for approximately three-fourths of all mishaps in 1933 assigned to driving blunders.
2. Failed to slow down at intersections.
3. Failed to keep to the right.
4. Tried to pass another car going in the same direction when view was obstructed.
5. Failed to slow down on approaching pedestrians.
6. Passed on the right of a preceding vehicle.
7. Ignored important traffic control devices.
8. Parked at dangerous spots.

If drivers will obey the eight common sense rules suggested by these violations, the annual accident record can be reduced to a negligible figure.

Tuffy Griffith In Person

Deerwood.—"Tuffy" Griffith, heavyweight prize fighter, lived up to his name when he entered the Deerwood Lunch Room last week. He introduced himself as "Tuffy Griffith in person—prize fighter from Iowa on his way to Bemidji." He said he could lick any son in town, and he looked it, too. He was bareheaded, in his shirt sleeves, wore heavy hobnailed shoes, and impregnated the atmosphere with the odor of John Barleycorn. "Tuffy" proceeded to take charge of the place. Mrs. Soder phoned for the marshal and a few minutes after the arrival of Helmer Simonson "Tuffy Griffith in person" was languishing in the village bastile.

Primary Vote Was Big

With a total of 713,652, Minnesota cast the biggest primary vote in history on June 18. Complete official figures show that the vote was divided as follows:

Farmer-Labor	280,152
Democratic	267,248
Republican	166,252

Two years ago, with a grand total of 530,127, the division was:

Republican	267,600
Farmer-Labor	157,007
Democratic	105,519

Floyd B. Olson polled the heaviest vote of his career, 236,221, which far exceeded the vote of any single candidate in this election. His Farmer-Labor opponent, John Lind, got 33,268.

The eight Democratic candidates for governor received a moderate amount each, Regan being nominated by 91,076 votes.

Martin A. Nelson, the Republican winner, polled 117,893 votes, and was one of four seeking the nomination.

The Reason Why - -

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

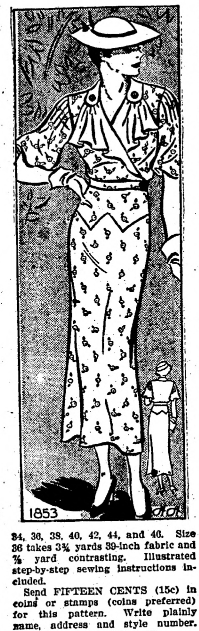
HERE'S SMART WAY TO "SLENDERIZE"

PATTERN 1853

It is so much pleasanter and simpler to look slender, than to get slender, that half the time it is not worth while to go through all that bothersome business of diet and exercise. At least not until the resources of a smart, slenderizing frock like this have been exhausted. You could easily take off ten pounds and not get anything like the satisfactory results this skilfully cut gown gives. The surplice, the jabots, the double points in the skirt, all are carefully calculated to contribute graceful slim lines as well as chic.



Pattern 1853 is available in sizes 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44, and 46. Size 36 takes 3¾ yards 39-inch fabric and ⅞ yard contrasting. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address all orders to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 243 West Seventeenth Street, New York City.

General Strike in San Francisco Area Collapses—North Dakota's Hot Political Row—Mrs. McAdoo Divorces the Senator.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

ONCE more it has been demonstrated that the general strike is not a successful weapon in the hands of organized labor in the United States in industrial disputes. The San Francisco unions, dominated for the moment by radicals, undertook to use this weapon, and within two days were forced to admit their failure. Governor Merriam, Mayor Rossi and other officials, strongly backed by public opinion, were determined that San Francisco and the surrounding communities should not be deprived of the necessities of life, that the embargo on food shipments should be broken and that transportation should not be stopped. Nearly 8,000 members of the National Guard were mobilized to aid the police, and their efforts were seconded by hastily formed bands of vigilantes which raided the headquarters and gathering places of the Communists. The central committee in charge of the strike soon realized the movement was collapsing and the conservative members, regaining control, relaxed the restrictions, and made an offer of arbitration under certain conditions.

Harry Bridges

On Thursday the general strike was formally called off and the men ordered back to work.

General Johnson, NRA administrator, acting as spokesman for the federal maritime dispute board there, was on hand determined to bring about a peaceful settlement. The Pacific coast maritime strike, on behalf of which the mass walkout was called, remained a difficult problem, for the longshoremen and maritime workers were insistent that the main dispute in their case, control of the "hiring halls," should not be subjected to arbitration.

To the average person the whole thing looked unreasonable and unnecessary. The longshoremen, like their fellow workers all along the west coast, have been on strike for changed working conditions, and were joined by the marine workers and teamsters. Then Joseph P. Ryan, national president of the longshoremen, signed an agreement that the men would return to work pending arbitration and a labor disputes board was appointed by President Roosevelt. But Harry Bridges, an Australian radical who is head of the local maritime workers, gained control of the situation and absolutely blocked the move for arbitration, persuading the men to repudiate the Ryan agreement. In the unions of the San Francisco metropolitan area it is said the conservatives outnumber the radicals, but the latter are trained in the tactics of intimidation and are seeking to wreck the trades unions for the benefit of the cause of Communism.

Mayor Angelo J. Rossi announced a pledge to run every "Communistic agitator" out of San Francisco. The pledge, announced through an emergency citizens' committee, said:

"I pledge to you that I, as chief executive in San Francisco, to the full extent of my authority, will run out of San Francisco every Communistic agitator, and this is going to be a continuing policy in San Francisco."

THERE was disquieting strike news from many parts of the country. The unions of Portland, Ore., were pushing their plans for a general strike, and their officials said nothing could now be done to prevent it. The truck drivers of Minneapolis and their helpers voted for a renewal of their strike which in May tied up transportation and resulted in fatal riots.

Representatives of 40 out of 42 locals of the United Textile Workers in Alabama decided on a state-wide strike which will affect 18,000 operatives. The date was not announced. Demands made to the employers include: Thirty hour week with $12 minimum pay, abolition of the "stretchout" system, reinstatement of all jobs abolished under the stretchout system; re-employment of all workers discharged for union activity and recognition of the textile workers' union for collective bargaining under provisions of the NRA.

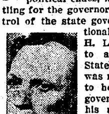
Employees of Walter J. Kohler in Kohler village, Wisconsin, are out on strike and began picketing the plant, though it has been closed down since July 4. These workers for whom Kohler built and maintained an "ideal" industrial town and who have been treated with remarkable generosity by the company, demand recognition of their union, a minimum wage of 65 cents an hour and a 30-hour week. The company has its own employees' union, a minimum wage of 40 cents an hour, and a 40-hour week.

CONSTITUTIONALITY of the Bankhead cotton act is to be tested in the federal courts. Gaston Therrell of Columbus, Miss., has served notice that he will bring the suit in the United States district court at Meridian, directing it against Henry A. Wallace, secretary of agriculture, and internal revenue and extension officials in the state charged with execution of the act's provisions.

HOUSING conditions in the United States amply demonstrate the need for new housing, Acting Secretary Dickinson of the Commerce department said in making public results of a national "real property inventory," now being conducted by the Commerce department.

Sixteen per cent of 1,811,462 dwellings in 90 cities are in crowded condition "or worse," Mr. Dickinson said. An additional 16.6 per cent are in need of structural repairs and 44.7 per cent need minor repairs. The incomplete returns show 32,442 houses, or 2.34 per cent of the total, as "unfit for human habitation."

NORTH DAKOTA was in a state of political chaos, with two men battling for the governorship and the control of the state government and National Guard. William H. Langer, according to a ruling of the State Supreme court, was no longer entitled to hold the office of governor because of his recent conviction on charges of conspiracy to defraud the federal government. The court decreed that he must give up his office to Gov. Ole H. Olson. Langer defied the court, refused to move out of office, summoned the National Guard to support him and called a special session of the legislature, which he dominates.



Ole H. Olson

Olson countermanded these orders, and Adjt. Gen. Earle R. Sarles seemed to side with him, though he kept two companies of the National Guard on duty in Bismarck to quell possible disorders. It was reported that thousands of farmers were on their way to the capital city determined to support Langer in whatever action he might demand. It was believed the legislature would vote wholesale impeachments of state officials, possibly including the members of the Supreme court, who voted to oust Langer.

State Senator A. B. Bonzer, in an address at Bismarck, declared the jurists had "pretended to base their decision as though interpreting the constitution of this state."

"The Supreme court of this state," he said, "has linked itself with the federal courts in an endeavor to continue the persecution of one who has dared to be a leader for the common people—namely, Gov. William Langer."

Langer and several co-defendants were convicted in June. The federal government charged that the Langer group forced federal employees to contribute to a political fund. This fund, it was said, was collected supposedly for a newspaper. The government contended that the money eventually went into the campaign chest. Langer soon afterward was re-nominated by an overwhelming vote, and following this he was sentenced to 18 month in prison.

SENATOR WILLIAM G. McADOO of California was too fond of politics and travel to suit his wife, whose interests were in sculpture, painting and home life. So the former Eleanor Wilson, daughter of the war-time President, went before a judge in Los Angeles with her complaint and in 42 minutes had been granted an interlocutory divorce decree. "Mental cruelty" was the charge, and Mrs. McAdoo testified that the senator had been living almost entirely in Washington for two years, and that it was impossible for her to reside in the National Capital because the climate there was injurious to her health.

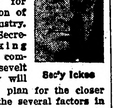
Senator McAdoo did not contest the divorce, and there was a property settlement the details of which were not made public. The custody of the two children was vested in both parents. It was revealed that the McAdoos have been separated since last December.

DAYS of torrential rain in the mountains of southern Poland resulted in raging floods that poured through the valleys, drowning perhaps as many as three hundred persons. More than 55,000 were without food and shelter. The property loss was tremendous, all the crops just harvested being ruined.

Many popular resorts crowded by summer vacationists were cut off. Eighty-three camps of Boy and Girl Scouts were evacuated; after the youths experienced harrowing difficulties.

FOR several hours earthquakes shook all Panama and Costa Rica, but the Panama canal was unhurt. The most serious damage was at David, Panama, not far from the Costa Rican border. There many buildings fell and scores of persons were injured. Considerable losses were sustained also at Puerto Armuelles, the United Fruit company's Pacific side banana headquarters. One American soldier was killed by jumping from a barracks window at Fort Davis.

PRESIDENTIAL SECRETARY MARVIN M'INTYRE announced that the President had created a special committee to formulate a new federal policy concerning the generation and distribution of electricity, and in Washington this was looked upon as a probable move for the nationalization of the power industry. In a letter to Secretary Ickes asking him to head the committee, Mr. Roosevelt said: "Its duty will be to develop a plan for the closer co-operation of the several factors in our electrical power supply—both public and private—whereby national policy in power matters may be unified and electricity be made more broadly available at cheaper rates to industry, to domestic, and, particularly, to agricultural consumers.



Sec'y Ickes

"As time goes on, there undoubtedly will be legislation on the subject of holding companies and for the regulation of electric current in interstate commerce. This committee should consider what lines should be followed in shaping up this legislation. Since a number of the states have commissions having jurisdiction over intrastate power matters, it is necessary that whatever plan is developed should have regard to the powers of these various state commissions as well as of the states in general."

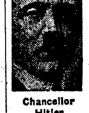
Besides Mr. Ickes, who is to act as chairman, the committee will consist of Dr. Elwood Mead, bureau of reclamation; Frank R. McNinch, federal power commission; Morris L. Cooke, of the PWA Mississippi valley committee; Maj. Gen. Edward M. Markham, chief of army engineers; Robert E. Healy, of the federal stock exchange commission; David E. Lillienthal, Tennessee valley authority, and T. W. Norcross, assistant chief of the forest service.

KING GEORGE of England officially opened the Mersey tunnel connecting Liverpool and Birkenhead, the largest underwater highway of its kind in the world. More than half a mile longer than the Holland tunnel of New York, the tube under the Mersey river stretches 11,380 feet from the main entrance in Birkenhead. In addition to the main tunnel, which accommodates four vehicles abreast, there are two-lane tributaries connecting the docks which give the whole undertaking a length of 15,465 feet.

The engineers responsible for the design of the $35,500,000 tube, chief among whom is Sir Basil Mott, concede they owe much to the experience American engineers gained on the Holland tunnel. They waited until the American tunnel had been operated before completing their plans for the Mersey project's ventilation plant.

TAMMANY HALL has a new chieftain in the person of James J. Dooling, elected at the urgent demand of Postmaster General Farley. He took his seat at the head of the once great Democratic organization and announced that he would undertake to do two things. The first is to restore harmony within the society by eliminating factional disputes; the second, and perhaps harder task, is to change the New York point of view toward Tammany.

ALL Germany and most of the rest of the world heard Adolf Hitler justify his bloody purging of the Nazi party, involving the violent deaths of 77 persons, and his defiance of his enemies within and without the reich. The chancellor in his speech before a complaisant reichstag employed his well known gift of oratory to the limit, and unless the Berlin correspondents are mistaken, he won to his support the great majority of Germans who were wavering in their allegiance to him.



Chancellor Hitler

Hitler not only defended the slaughter of the alleged conspirators, but also gave warning that a like fate awaits all other "traitors."

"Every one is to know for all future times," he said, "that, if he raises his hand for attack against the state, certain death will be his lot."

Far from apologizing for the killings, he shouted: "I gave orders to shoot those who were mainly responsible for treachery. I gave further orders to burn out into the raw flesh the pest boil of our internal well poisoning and the poisoning of foreign countries. I was the supreme court of the land for 24 hours."

His indictment of Roehm and the circle of perverts that surrounded him was terrific in its details and convincing to most of his countrymen.

Just before the delivery of his address, Hitler and his government were notified by Great Britain and Italy that they approved the eastern European security pacts that France is fostering. These would include Russia, Poland, the Baltic states and Czechoslovakia, and unless Germany also signed up the result would be the forging of an iron band around the reich.

Hitler alluded to this plan in defiant language. He said:

"If our trade balance, through economic barriers in foreign markets or through political boycott, becomes a passive one, we shall, through our own ability and thanks to the genius of our inventors and chemists, find ways of making ourselves independent of those raw materials which we ourselves are in a position to manufacture or find substitutes for."

Lightweight Dinosaur Small but Ferocious

Maybe you picture a dinosaur like Alley Oop's pet, a monster of gigantic proportions.

The American Museum of Natural History has told of a dinosaur no bigger than a mastiff, but light and fast with hooked, saw-edged teeth, as dangerous by itself as a pack of wolves.

This formidable beast roamed the prairies and hills of Montana 120,000,000 years ago. Its fossilized bones were found in south central Montana, twelve miles south of the village of Harlowton, last October.

Careful investigation delayed the announcement. Fragments of the dinosaur's mineralized body have been hewn and chiseled out of the solid rock.

The fragments tell of a fighter that must have bid for the lightweight championship of its era. The bones are hollow, suggesting lightness and speed. The hind legs were about fifteen inches off the ground at the hips. The body balanced a slashing neck and a powerful, flailing tail—the neck alone two and a half feet long.

"At present," the museum authorities said, "it is impossible to fully visualize the skull, but it must have been unusually large, for the saw-bladed, recurved teeth are relatively larger than in any described carnivorous dinosaur. The front legs were powerful, and relatively better developed than in the great "tryannosaurus."

The discovery was made by Dr. Barnum Brown, of the Museum of Natural History.

IS CRAZY WATER EPSOM SALTS

No, says Dr. W. E. Fitch in nation-wide broadcast over N.B.C. network

NOT A MAN-MADE DRUG

Tells why natural mineral water is so often beneficial for "rheumatic" aches and pains

On a recent Sunday afternoon broadcast on the National Broadcasting network the following discussion took place between Mr. Gene Arnold and Dr. W. E. Fitch, internationally known authority on natural mineral waters.

GENE ARNOLD: "I receive letters from people saying they heard that Crazy Water Crystals are made of nothing but salts—Epsom Salts or Glauber's Salts. These people want to know if it's true you can buy some of these salts for a few cents, and get the same effect as you do with Crazy Water Crystals."

DR. FITCH: "No, it is NOT true."

GENE ARNOLD: "I'm glad to hear you say that, because I know your opinion is worth a great deal. But will you explain a little more about it? What are the true facts?"

DR. FITCH: "The facts are that it has always been hard for a few doubting Thomases and skeptics to believe that old Mother Nature knows how to prepare and compound natural mineral waters in a way that cannot be duplicated in a laboratory. In the course of my studies I have found that those same doubts were expressed Two Thousand Years Ago, in the early days of natural mineral water therapy. The truth is that natural mineral water and natural crystals from such waters are as different from synthetic or artificial salts as day from night. And that's why the medical profession has always been in favor of the Natural Waters — has always insisted that they are the one product of Nature that cannot be imitated successfully by man. People have tried for many, many years to make up synthetic concoctions to take their place but they do not have the same effect. The predominating chemical constituent of Crazy Water Crystals is sodium sulphate, but it is in its Natural State, and has a far different physiological effect than the synthetic salts made in a laboratory. When you buy salts for a few cents you get just what you pay for—a dose of salts. But when you use Crazy Water Crystals, you get undiluted minerals in their natural state, taken from natural mineral water by evaporation with nothing added."

That is why Crazy Water Crystals have proven themselves so beneficial in the treatment of "rheumatic" aches and pains. Thousands of people in all parts of the United States testify to this.

If you, or any of your friends, suffer from "rheumatic" pains we suggest you investigate Crazy Water Crystals immediately. Ask any of the millions who have used them. Then get a standard size box—it costs only $1.50 and is ample for at least three weeks treatment. Crazy Water Company, Mineral Wells, Texas.

Crazy Water Crystals are for sale by dealers displaying the red and green Crazy Water Crystals sign. Get a box today.

MINNESOTA WATERWAY

Diversion of 1,500 cubic feet of water per second from Lake Michigan at Chicago will be adequate to maintain a nine-foot channel in the Illinois river, the last important link in the Lakes-to-Gulf waterway, according to a report submitted to the house committee on rivers and harbors by Major General Edward L. Markham, chief of army engineers.

The report of the army engineers, a wholly impartial and disinterested body, was taken as the conclusive answer to critics of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway on this score. Chicago and lower Mississippi interests, opposing the seaway treaty, have claimed that 1,500 cubic second feet would be insufficient, but General Brown declared the construction of only two dams at LaGrange and Peoria, Ill., would maintain nine feet of water in the Illinois at all seasons.

Senator Henrik Shipstead, Minnesota, called attention to the engineering report in a debate on the floor of the senate. He pointed out that the 1,500 cubic second feet diversion will give the Illinoiss a total flow of 3,400 cubic feet per second, which is more than three times the volume of the Ohio river, 1,100 cubic second feet at low water. The Ohio carries 20,000,000 tons of freight annually, the senator declared, while the Illinois is expected to handle no more than 10,000,000 tons.

The Illinois river volume, Senator Shipstead said, would be two and a half times the volume of the Panama canal and far greater than that of the Monongahela, which carries the densest volume of tonnage in the United States, 25,000,000 tons per year.

At the same time, the senator produced records showing that in 1920 when the seaway project first was broached, western railway executives, speaking for themselves, all were in favor of it, though they are now reported to be against it. He quoted unequivocal indorsements of the seaway by Ralph Budd, then president of the Great Northern; S. M. Felton, Great Western; Hale Holden, then president of the Burlington; A. H. Scandrett of the Milwaukee; Howard Elliott of the Northern Pacific; Fred W. Sargent of the North Western.

"All these executives said they expected their railroads to benefit from the seaway because it would help to remove the midwest economic handicap precipitated by the opening of the Panama canal," Senator Shipstead said. "When they spoke for the seaway, they spoke for themselves. Now a Mr. Thom, who says he represents 'all the railroads,' comes before a committee and says these men have changed their minds. What happened in the dark to cause this change?

"The railroad dictators, the banking interests, have subverted and perverted use of the railroads, because they want the western roads simply to feed freight to the eastern roads and the western executives have no voice of their own. Instead, Mr. Thom is sent down here to tell us they have changed their minds about the seaway."

As to the alleged "nationalization" of Lake Michigan, under the seaway treaty, Senator Shipstead declared its condition would be no different than it has been under the treaty of 1909, giving Canada the right to send ships into Lake Michigan, except that 1909 treaty could be terminated in one year, while the present treaty permits use of the lake by Canada permanently. However, the United States under a treaty of 1871, was given use of the St. Lawrence river forever, he added.

SEES FULL DINNER PAIL AS AID TO FARMERS

That the diet of the American people in the years to come may be a factor of commanding importance in determining the nation's future need for agricultural land, was emphasized by Dr. O. E. Baker, senior agricultural economist, U. S. Bureau of Agricultural Economics, in a recent address at University Farm.

On the basis of four different diets recommended by the U. S. Bureau of Home Economics for families at varying levels of income, Dr. Baker estimated that the land required to furnish the food specified in these diets would range from 1.2 acres per person for the most restricted diet, scarcely adequate to maintain health, up to over 3 acres for a so-called "liberal" diet.

About 2.3 acres per person are utilized to produce the food now consumed in the United States, Dr. Baker said, and "it appears probable that the liberal diet recommended by the Bureau of Home Economics would require about a third more crop land than the present diet of the American people. If it were possible to provide the poor with the food they need to maintain health and efficiency, the agricultural 'surplus' would quickly disappear. The 'liberal' diet, for example, provides over a half more milk, but only half as much wheat flour, as the per capita consumption at present, and over twice as much is required to produce the same number of calories of milk as of wheat flour.

"If, on the other hand, the poor increase in number, while the middle and upper classes decrease, less land doubtless, will be needed to feed the American people. It is of great importance to American agriculture that the standard of living of the city people, as well as of rural people be maintained, and even raised."

One man who has conducted an investigation says that there is "little difference between a high hat and a dunce cap."

CATCH FREAK FISH WHILE FISHING IN POND

Little Falls—While fishing in a quarry pond east of the city the first of the week two boys saw a queer looking fish which they netted and brought to J. M. Totten for identification. Mr. Totten has not identified it, however, as it apparently is a freak, and looks like a cross between a dog-fish and bull head. It moves around rapidly in a bowl; has a fin down its back and feathers like those on a chicken, in six appendages. Its eyes are in the top of its head and it has four legs.

FORMER OWATONNA BOY FINDS PLANT WILT CURE

Owatonna—To Dr. RoyalN. Chapman, a former Owatonna boy, the Hawaiian Islands owe a great deal for his work in saving the pineapple industry, which is the principal crop and source of income of the United States mid Pacific territory composed of a group of comparatively small islands. Dr. Chapman, who is one of the world's greatest entomologists and authorities on economic zoology found the cure against the pineapple parasites which were eating up the young plants. These parasites had caused the plants to wilt. The Hawaiian Islands salute you, Dr. Royal N. Chapman.

"HOMESTEAD NOTICE" PUBLISHED IN PAPER

Fergus Falls—The Henning Advocate is publishing a "Homestead Notice" such as were very common in Minnesota newspapers years ago, but which are almost unknown today. R. C. Corick gives notice that he is "proving up" on five acres of land that he has taken as a homestead on the shore of a small lake in Dead Lake township. The last notice that was published before this one appeared years ago when John Jeangeneau proved up on a portion of the "Tail" at the northeast corner of Otter Tail Lake, where the river enters into the lake. It was this "Tail" of land which the Indians called Otters tail, a name later given to the lake and county.

FAIR PLANS BIG FARM PROGRAM

Barn Dance, Rural Events Featured at Chicago Aug. 11 to 18.

Chicago.—Four million persons have entered the gates of the new World's Fair since it opened here May 26. Most of the throngs that have thrilled to the new spectacle, the new "foreign villages" which offer in themselves a "tour of the world," the new shows and the new free entertainment projects, are city dwellers. Chicagoans, visitors from other cities all over the United States and visitors from foreign countries have poured in, in large numbers.

But the real farmer-visitors' invasion of A Century of Progress has not yet begun. It will reach its peak when the Fair celebrates Farm Week, from August 11 to August 18, inclusive.

Last year Farm Week accounted for the largest single week's attendance of the entire Fair. Plans to make the celebration interesting and important to farmers are even more elaborate now than last year, according to the events division of the exposition.

W. L. S. Barn Dance at Fair.

Saturday, August 11, will lead off the program with a massive farm parade, including bands, farm implements, machinery and equipment and farm animals. Depicting the modernization of agriculture, it will be one of the longest and most comprehensive pageants of the entire exposition.

Sunday, August 12, will see special music and farm programs interlinked with the observance of Chicago Incorporation day, with Chicago acting as host to the out-of-town multitudes.

Rexford Tugwell, assistant secretary of agriculture, has been invited to be the principal speaker of the Farm Organization day program Monday. Tuesday will be farm radio day, with the entire WLS "Barn Dance" cast presenting a program in the Court of States; 40,000 persons saw this event in 1933.

Aerial Sham Battle Planned.

The farmer's wife will have her day Wednesday, August 15, which has been named Farm Women's day, with special programs arranged to pay tribute to the women who battled to carve a nation out of the wilderness. Farm Youth day, Thursday, will be full of recognition of the future farmers of the land, with emphasis on 4-H club work.

Programs of interest to rural newspapers and magazines will feature Farm Press day, Friday. Saturday, August 18, will be farm music day, with its high spot the gigantic Chicagoland Music festival in Soldier Field, adjoining the Fair grounds. This annual event has attracted more than a half million persons in the four years of its existence. This day will also see many special contests, such as milkmaid, husband-calling and hog-calling contests.

Saturday is also Illinois day. There will be a review of 10,000 troops and demonstrations by anti-aircraft artillery units, shooting with tracer bullets at balloon targets towed by airplanes.

Farm Exhibits Are Many.

During Farm Week parties of farmers will be taken on free guided tours of the Fair grounds. Farm visitors, with only a limited time to spend, will this way be able to see everything of vital interest to them.

Henry Ford's industrialized barn, where he shows how the farmer may, at low cost, raise soy beans, obtain the residue and process it himself, making industrial products for which he can obtain a profitable revenue, is one of the new exhibits. Another is the International Harvester company's radio-controlled tractor, which demonstrates how farming may some day be done from an easy chair on the veranda. Model farm homes will attract many rural sightseers, as will the exhibits of the great packing plants and the automobile manufacturers.

The Brook Hill Dairy farm, with its model farm of 1950, shows the last word in modern milk production, from cow to bottle. The International Egg Laying contest is a huge laboratory where the farmer may study the latest egg-production methods first-hand. Scores of commercial exhibitors will have displays of prime interest to Farm-Week visitors.

Special Rates Lower Cost.

Special railroad and bus rates will make it easier for the farmer to get to the Fair this summer. Automobile agencies and oil stations will give him assistance in highway travel. At the Fair, he will find costs surprisingly low. Restaurants are cheaper, transportation is cheaper, there is plentiful free entertainment and eighty per cent of all the comfort stations are free.

Probably one of the leading attractions for rural visitors will be the foreign villages, so faithful in their reproductions of life and scenes in fifteen countries that they offer the equivalent of a tour of the world, right on the Fair grounds.

Eggs In Summer

What you make on eggs depends to a large extent on the kind of eggs you offer for sale. In these days of grading, the person whose hens have to shift for themselves will always get a large number of "B" grades or worse. Hens can not long lay standard-sized eggs without a well balanced ration in generous amounts.

But in the summer time, many other complications set in. Eggs are very perishable. Fertile eggs are especially hard to handle. The germ starts to grow at 68 degrees Fahrenheit—which is much cooler than we expect it to be through most of the summer. By the time the hen has left the nest, considerable germ development has taken place—and the egg falls into a lower grade. Even if the egg is not a fertile one, the heat causes the contents to break down somewhat, so that the white looks watery and the whole egg is inclined to flatten out when broken. In addition, evaporation is constantly taking place so that the air cell gets larger if the egg is exposed to warm dry air.

If you would get Grade "A" prices all through the summer, (1) feed a complete mash all summer; (2) dispose of all male birds, old and young by June 1, if possible; (3) gather eggs at least three times a day and leave them to cool before packing; (4) hold at temperatures below 68 degrees Fahrenheit. If cases are placed on blocks, just off the basement floor, the eggs will keep cool without the danger of sweating when removed for sale.—Cora Cooke.

Tip on Cabbage-Cooking

In America we eat more cabbage than any other vegetable, except potatoes, and we come by the taste very naturally. Our forefathers brought their cabbage with them across the sea. But there is something very wrong with the old-world way of cooking it. From one and a half to three hours they used, whether they steamed, or boiled, or baked it. And that explains, probably, why some people do not like cabbage and may even abominate the odor which pervades the house when it is cooked the old, long-time way. But if you cook it five, ten, or fifteen minutes only, instead of hours, such complaints will cease. Delicate flavor, delicious texture, and no "cabbage odor" at all in the house are the results of the short-time cooking. More important still, by short-time cooking you prevent the loss of food values like vitamin C.—Eva L. Blair.

Blessing Our Hours With Beauty

The air is just as full of good sights for the worker as for the idler, and it depends only upon the aliveness of our own spirits whether we toil like dumb animals or bless our laboring hours with the beauty of life. Such enjoyment is possible, after a little practice, without taking much of that time we call so valuable and waste so sinfully. "I haven't time," says the farmer, the banker, the professor, when, as a matter of fact, he has all the time that anybody has—this moment, this great and golden moment!—but knows not how to employ it.—From the "Adventures of David Grayson."

The Modern Mother

Through all the past ages the requirements of a good home-maker and mother seemed to be that she love her home, love her children, and stay at home to care for home and children.

Modern conditions require the homemaker to recognize that her sphere is not bounded by her front doorstep, but that she must live up to Frances Willard's beautifully expressed message, "The mission of the ideal woman is to make the whole world more homelike." She must know that in order to have the right conditions for her children she must be a part—and a thinking, active, forceful part—of the moral, social, educational, and public activities of her own immediate world. The real homemaker of today, therefore, has a dual responsibility, and it is hard to say where one part ends or the other part begins.—Julia O. Newton.

CHAPTER I

—1—

As the one-train-a-day pursued its course through a sparsely settled hill country, Janet Mercer was conjecturing why parents should send their boys and girls to school in such a lonely region.

From her bag she had taken more than once the clipping of an advertisement, pinned to the letter which had so greatly aroused her interest and had resulted in her burning her bridges and coming to this unfamiliar region to teach English literature and rhetoric.

The advertisement had first caught her attention because of its odd wording:

"Lostland academy. Famous in its time in the Fingerlake region. It still adheres to classical education; and regards an acquaintance with Horace as a privilege to be sought, not evaded, in the interest of urbanity. A new faculty is being brought together; and the honor of aiding in its composition is open to early applicants. College graduates only need apply. A teacher of English literature and rhetoric is needed; also a teacher of mathematics and chemistry."

The letter, signed Gordon Haskell, was more circumstantial:

"My Dear Miss Mercer:

"Your letter of application for the post of teacher of English literature and rhetoric in Lostland academy pleased me greatly. You seem well qualified for the position, and I should judge that you were a young lady not easily disturbed or excited, and fully equipped mentally to earn the generous salary of three hundred a month for the eight teaching months, which is the standard salary for my teachers. I believe that if you desire talent you must be willing to pay for it; and the noble work of educating our future citizens should never be underpaid.

"To reach Lostland academy you must change cars at Oteaga and take a branch line. We have but one train a day, which leaves Oteaga at 10 a. m. and arrives here at 4. Unfortunately it has neither pullman nor dining car, so you would do well to bring a station lunch box. You will be met at Blade—perhaps there will be another member of the faculty traveling down at the same time."

Janet had looked her fellow-passengers over several times in the hope of identifying "another member of the faculty"; but, no one fitting in her preconception, she chose a man about twenty-seven years old, in whose countenance she thought she detected ability to solve mathematical problems.

He, too, had brought a station lunch box; and about noon he examined its contents; but he ate mechanically, and then settled to the examination of a letter. After a time he made a journey down the rocking aisle of the train to the water tank, where he had infinite difficulty in clawing out a paper cup, then in shaping it and conveying the nicked rim to his lips. With an air of relief and some water on his vest he came down the aisle.

The train was rocking and rattling over the curved track as if apprehensive that it would never reach its destination.

As the train turned a curve, the young man passed Janet's seat, and was nearly precipitated into it. Simultaneously he regained his balance and saw the letter outspread on her lap.

"I'm so sorry," he apologized in a delightful voice. "And will you think me very impertinent? May I inquire if you are on the way to Lostland academy?"

"Yes. I am the teacher of English literature and rhetoric."

"And I'm slated for mathematics and chemistry."

"Won't you—sit down?"

"Thanks." He smiled boyishly as if really grateful to her for the invitation. Beneath the smile she read a certain bewilderment, mingled, when his eyes were turned toward her, with frank and friendly admiration. He was thinking that she was very pretty. He liked her blue serge suit and her close little velvet hat from under which her eyes regarded him kindly.

"Rather strange landscape," he ventured. "But it's all strange—my sudden coming—the letter—the large salary—and every one on the same basis."

"Yes, it is apparently a standardized sum. I wonder how many teachers are on the faculty? Mr. Haskell's expenses must be very heavy—but then he probably has a great many students."

Arthur Fleming was regarding her with meditative, admiring eyes. "Somehow it all seems rather ideal—the lonely country—a number of people with a common purpose marooned among these hills. I don't like cities. I am looking forward to cross-country walks—skating. Do you skate?"

"Yes—I am very fond of outdoor sports."

"And I suppose you love your subjects; or you would scarcely be teaching them."

"English literature, especially. I feel as if I were a mistress of ceremonies, and should I wave a wand, a blind man with beautiful thoughts and visions would enter; or a melancholy poet with the heart of a child and a great fear about his salvation, or a stern and passionate young woman whose soul, I am sure, still haunts the purple heather in Yorkshire."

"Milton, Cowper, and Emily Bronte," he commented with a smile. "I am a great lover of Dickens. I want to go to London before all his haunts have vanished. I should like to see Dover as David Copperfield did. You remember he imagined his mother coming down the shining road of the sea. Mine died when I was three."

"My mother is dead, too; and my father married again."

"I am so glad—you are to be on the faculty."

His color rose a little and his clear boyish eyes were directed again to the flying hills.

"There was another strange thing," she ventured. "I did not find Lostland academy listed in any of the educational directories."

"I looked for it, too—then I thought it might possibly have a new official name; and be unregistered. I wish we were there. I want to have all my questions answered."

"What time is it?"

"Just three. One hour more."

Blade proved to be a flag station. No one but himself and Janet Mercer and a middle-aged woman in black alighted from the train. The three stood uncertainly on the rough unpainted platform; and then the woman in black approached them, a shade of anxiety in her kindly, sensible face.

"I am Mrs. Denver," she said, "the new matron at Lostland academy. I expected to be met, but I do not see anyone. Are you acquainted here?"

"No, we are strangers. This is Mr. Fleming, one of the new teachers; and I am Miss Mercer."

"I am glad you are going there, too!" Mrs. Denver exclaimed with unmistakable relief. "This seems such a lonesome place."

Undeniably it did. The hills, vast and grayish-green in color as if from outcroppings of granite, rose with threatening abruptness immediately back of the little station. From the station roof a rotting sign hung bearing in faded crimson letters the word "Blade." Some one long ago had emphasized the name by drawing in with crimson paint the rough outline of a dagger held in a gaunt fist. For some unknown reason the eyes of the three people were drawn to this symbol.

"May I Inquire if You Are on the Way to Lostland Academy?"

"What an odd location for an academy," Janet commented, beginning to feel rather homesick and lonely—and thankful that Mrs. Denver was there, with her obvious good balance and her kindly, concerned face. Fleming did not answer her comment, but Janet saw that he was puzzled, and that he shared the dismay of his companions.

The silence about them was intense—except for the moaning of the wind in the telegraph wires. The country had a wild, almost a savage aspect.

"I imagine Haskell relies as much on fresh air as on the urbanities of Horace to bring his pupils forward; and considering that he knew three of us were arriving on this one train a day, it seems strange he didn't send some kind of a conveyance for us."

"Here comes a farmer with a load of apples," Mrs. Denver said. "Let's ask him."

The creaking old wagon was still several hundred yards away; and they watched its slow progress with impatience. A wizened old man was hunched in the driver's seat, and the slack reins hung almost to the ground. Behind him was a mound of greenish apples, and his gray hair blew in the mountain wind. As he drew near, Arthur hailed him.

"Can you tell us how to get to Lostland academy, and how far it is from here?"

The slack rein was drawn up, but the inquiries were not answered immediately. The driver stared with a curious expression at them as if they were in some way marked and identified by their connection with this academy as destined for no ordinary experiences.

"I know the place—ought to—it's been there more'n a hundred years. He'll send for you, all right—mebbe will be easier to get there than to come away."

"Why do you say that?" Arthur demanded. "Is there anything wrong with the place?"

The countryman's manner became secretive, almost shy. "I dunno as there is—I never heard nothin'. 'Twas a big school in Doctor Bracebridge's day. Haskell'll send for you, all right."

Claims to Longevity Hard to Substantiate

Zaro Agha, who died in the Children's hospital at Istanbul, Turkey, a short time ago, may indeed have been the world's oldest man, though widespread doubt will resist the claim of the ancient Turk that he was one hundred and sixty years of age. He could have been many years younger than the age he claimed and still compete with authenticated cases of extreme age that have been checked by men interested in longevity. In fact, he could have cast off almost a half century from his claim and still have been in sharp competition with the most extreme case of longevity ever fully authenticated by scientific investigation, not quite 111 years.

There can be no doubt but that Agha was a very old man and that he carried his years lightly, but the evidence of his greatest dependence in support of his claim, a birth certificate in which the "dogum tarihi," or date of birth, is set at 1191 on the Moslem calendar, or February 16, 1774, few months more than two years before the American states declared their independence, may be questioned. Not so much its authenticity as to the record of a birth on the day mentioned, as that the Zaro Agha who has just died was the person whose birth was recorded.

As to Zaro's remembrance of having fought in the Bulgarian war when he was one hundred and three and at that age of carrying heavy artillery on his shoulders to heights that horses could not carry it; of his employment in a gun factory until he was one hundred and four or one hundred and five and his seeking other and easier work which he performed until he was one hundred and thirty-five, we must credit inaccuracies that must creep into memory.

For there is no warrant in man's knowledge of the persistence of life to give support to his claims. In fact, Science Service, which is making its place in collecting the findings of men of science and presenting them for the edification of those who have no aptitude for scientific understanding, leads us in the other direction as it cites the one hundred and eleven year age record that was substantiated by an English investigator who early in the century had considered close to a million cases of centenarians and found only 30 persons, 21 women and 9 men, who from outside sources could be shown to have lived 100 years or more. It is said that in this country several hundred death certificates annually show ages of more than one hundred years and occasionally the certified ages run as high as one hundred and twenty years. When reports are looked into, such things as inaccurate memories or mistaken identity often account for many of the mistakes that creep into the death statistics. We are inclined to mislead ourselves in the matter of ages.—St. Louis Globe Democrat.

BEAUTIFYING THE ROADSIDE

Roadside gasoline stations, markets, and small farms, which often are eyesores along the main highways in America, will be beautified at least along one stretch of countryside. Three Delaware women, Mrs. Pierre S. duPont, Mrs. Irenee duPont, and Mrs. Henry B. Thompson, have offered prizes for the best-kept places along the main highway in their state. It is their purpose to eliminate signboards and to beautify the highway by making the clean-up drive competitive.—Literary Digest.

The NEW Firestone CENTURY PROGRESS TIRE

Ten Million People HELPED TO BUILD THE TIRE SENSATION of '34!

Beyond Comparison In Quality, Construction, Appearance and Price With Any First Quality Tire Made

THE way to create a TIRE SENSATION is to give the people what they want, and Firestone has done this with the new Firestone Century Progress Tire.

As millions of people visited the Firestone Factory at the World's Fair last year, we asked this question—"What do you value most in a tire?" They answered—"Give us Blowout Protection, Non-Skid Safety, and Long Wear, at a moderate price." This was a big order, but Firestone has a habit of giving car owners what they want when they want it.

We knew there was only one way to build Quality and Value into a tire at a moderate price, and that was by volume production. We built the greatest tire ever made to sell at these low prices. Car owners are profiting because we found out what they wanted and found the way to give it to them.

The new Firestone Century Progress Tire IS EQUAL OR SUPERIOR to any first quality tire built, regardless of name, brand, by whom manufactured, or at what price offered for sale.

Summer Ice Skating at Fair

Winter weather all summer long is the novelty that is attracting thousands daily to the German Black Forest village in the new World's Fair at Chicago. Gigantic crowds are flocking to the new Street of Villages, for a "tour of the world" in a single day.

Fair Visitors to Explore 'Lost River'

DOWN THE LOST RIVER

Visitors to the new World's Fair which opens in Chicago May 26 will float, in a boat pushed by a prehistoric man, down the "Lost River" through the world of a million years ago in this new exposition feature located on the new Beach Midway. This is one of all the new, startling features offered to Fair visitors this summer, at low cost. The prehistoric monsters reproduced will be animated, in some cases by as many as sixteen motors. They will move, hiss and roar. There are ample tourist accommodations and parking space adjacent to the Fair.

Jungle Cats New Fair Thrill

Greatest animal act in history free to visitors to Chicago's new World's Fair which opens May 26. The great cat balances on the huge ball under the watchful eye of trainer Allen King, as part of the Standard Oil Company of Indiana exhibit this summer, featuring thirty-three lions, tigers and pumas in a single act. This is only one of 84 miles of free exhibits. Other features will be fifteen reproductions of actual foreign villages giving Exposition-goers a world tour right on the Fair grounds. New low rail and bus rates to the Fair have been announced. There is ample parking space for auto tourists just outside the Fair grounds.

Fair Relic

The Mississippi, ancient locomotive which helped to build the South 100 years ago, and is now in Wings of a Century at the Chicago World's Fair, provides a resting place for Mrs. M. O. Peterson, of Des Moines, Iowa, as Opie Read, famed author, tells something of its history.

Fair Landmark

Old North Church, a dominant landmark of Colonial Village, new feature of the new World's Fair which opens in Chicago May 26. The Colonial Village is but one of fifteen villages which actually will be reproductions of famous old world towns. Visitors to the new Fair, in effect, will accomplish a world cruise by a tour of these entrancing spots.

Views and Reviews

[The views below do not necessarily coincide with the official beliefs of this publication; they are merely personal observations.]

A few months back, a Prof. Wirt of the public schools of Gary, Ind., charged that the "brain trust," Roosevelt's advisory board, was composed principally of communists, and that their object was to plunge the country into communism. A congressional investigation was made; Wirt admitted that he had no proof for his statements; and the matter was finally dropped.

A certain class of people shuddered at Wirt's pronouncements. Are we going communistic? they asked one another.

To most people communism is something vague and dreadful —a bogeyman with which they are scared at certain times, for unknown reasons. Daily papers in America have used the bewhiskered bolshevik so many times for this purpose that the picture has become a symbol for terrorism.

Communism is being tried out in Russia. The people there have created huge state trusts which own and operate all public utilities, factories, railroads, etc., so that all are benefited equally.

In contrast to this we have America, where 5 per cent of the people own 95 per cent of the wealth, and by means of that ownership, control the destiny of the entire country.

It goes without saying that the eyes of the world are on Russia. Time alone will tell whether the experiment will succeed. The principle of the thing in right. After all, why should we spend our lives fattening the purses of the 5 per cent who own or control the power trust, the meat trust, the railroad trust, and all the rest? The people of Russia may be far ahead of us in that matter.

Coming back to our old pal—The Pathfinder cracks this one:

Straw Stacks Bonanzas This Year, Says Boss

With all kinds of straw except flax bringing farmers about $8 per ton in the Twin Cities and likely to command even higher prices before the 1934 grain crop is threshed, Red River Valley farmers will do well to preserve carefully every spear threshed this year, says Andrew Boss, vice director of the Minnesota Experiment Station, University Farm, St. Paul.

"The drouth has created an unusual demand for straw, both for feed and for bedding." he says, "and prices are bound to be high. Red River Valley farmers will have a bonanza in their straw stacks this year. If the straw is not needed for home use, it will yield a good supplement to the cash income from the grain fields.

"It should be stacked carefully to prevent spoiling, or, if dry, it should be baled immediately after threshing. Not one stack should be burned."

Triumph. — Arguments have caused wars, divorces, fights, marriages, murders, lawsuits, and a thousand other things, but this town boasts of a memorial to one of the warmest arguments that ever started here. Claim is made that while cold water has been thrown on debates this is the first one that ever dug a well. It started Tuesday morning at the Umhoefer Hardware Store where one of the boys was explaining the practice of "water witching." Gus Kramer insisted that water veins could be located by the practice and Umhoefer was just as certain that it was a lot of "hooey." The assemblage kept growing with each arrival championing one side or the other until the place became too small and the discussion too hot to remain inside. Gus then grabbed a branch off a nearby tree and started out. Soon the twig curled over and he offered to bet water could be found within a depth of twenty feet. Mr Edman procured another stick and started witching. Though not informed where Kramer claimed he had spotted a vein, Edman's stick took a nose dive at the very same place. This was more than the opponents could stand and they decided to start digging to find out if the water witching sticks knew what they were diving for. When the work started the crowd thinned out to some extend, but enough remained to keep the anger going. At fourteen feet a vein was tapped. The well was cleaned out and has fifteen feet of water in it. The hardware man is erecting a pump right there on Main street so people can get a good cool drink any time they wish.

Record for Early Threshing

The Moe brothers, farming southeast of town, started threshing Thursday, August 2, and report that they got a yield of 48 bushels of barley to the acre. We believe this is a record for early threshing. The barley yield is not to be sneezed at, either.

Crops are, in the main, good all through this section this year. If grain prices hold, which they are apt to on account of the continued drouth in other sections, farmers in this territory are going to regain quite a chunk of ground they lost in the last few years.

Yesterday Edgar Horien hauled in the first load of grain from this year's crop to be received at the local Barzen elevator.

Gloria Joann Thompson

On Wednesday of last week occurred the sudden death of Gloria Joann, the baby daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Clayton Thompson. The little one had always been healthy and happy, so her passing, which occurred during her sleep, came as a shock. She was born January 24, 1934, and was at the time of her death six months and eight days old.

Funeral services were conducted on Thursday from the home, Rev. Myhrer officiating, and interment was made in the Holt cemetery.

Those left to mourn her death, besides her parents, are a sister, Carolyn, her grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. A. O. Thompson and Mr. and Mrs. J. Mattson, and several other relatives.

Make Good for Mistakes

"Do not be forever regretful of a mistake," said Hi Ho, the sage of Chinatown, "but endeavor to balance it off by a series of worthy endeavors."

Daniel and Noah Webster

The relationship between Daniel Webster and Noah Webster, if any, has never been established. Records show that Daniel Webster, the statesman and orator, was born at Salisbury, N. H., January 18, 1782, and was descended from Thomas Webster who first appeared in Watertown, Mass., in 1638; and that Noah Webster, of dictionary fame, was born in Hartford, Conn., October 16, 1758, and was descended from John Webster, one of the first settlers at Hartford, in 1636. But there is no known relationship between the two.

Safetygrams BY FRED W. BRAUN © The Safety Man

I have repeatedly warned motorists about the careless practice of backing up without looking. Hind sight is as important as foresight. The rear view mirror should be so adjusted that you will always have a clear view of the road behind you. This is not only advisable for truck drivers but also for the passenger automobiles.

Many drivers park their car near the curb and leave it for a few minutes. In returning they find that someone has driven in ahead of them, and in order to get into the road they make a sudden backward movement, only to find that there has been an accident. Keep your rear view mirror clean and so adjusted that it will give you a clear vision of the road behind you.

The oiled highway through here was broken up with tractor and disc this week, and the road bed was made ready for re-oiling. On Wednesday the oiling paraphernalia was set up here, and oiling was expected to begin the end of the week.

Blackbirds Get Fine Meal Coming Through the Rye

Roseau.—While Roseau county is in dry territory a flock of blackbirds were recently treated to several rye set-ups. A division of army worms invaded a forty acre crop of rye south of Wannaska last week and proceeded to cut a path straight through the field. With their job half done a flock of blackbirds moved in and proceeded to devour the worms. They gathered in great numbers along the entire quarter of a mile and picked up every worm they could see. If a group of hunters had come along just then they would have had blackbird pie fit for a king.

The Mud Lake Situation

This week a couple of men from the department of conservation made a survey of the Mud Lake territory. According to reports, the government will form a wild game reserve there. Residents of Mud Lake and vicinity are deeply interested, as it means that they will be bought out.

It seems rather queer that, after thousands of dollars have been spent on drainage to make Mud Lake fit to farm, the territory should be turned into a game reserve just at the time when it begins to produce abundantly. But who are we to question the work of politicians, Jehovah, and the Izaak Walton League?

The only thing we can do is to caution Mud Lake residents not to be "sold out" too cheaply by those who pretend to work for your benefit, but in reality are shrewd dealers for the boys who want good hunting at a low price—to them.

The Reason Why - -

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.
For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

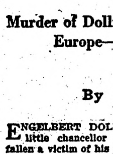
Murder of Dollfuss by Nazis Creates Serious Situation in Europe—Bandit Dillinger Slain by Federal Agents in Chicago.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

ENGELBERT DOLLFUSS, intrepid little chancellor of Austria, has fallen a victim of his political enemies. A group of 141 Nazis, disguised in uniforms, broke into the chancellory in Vienna and made prisoners of Dollfuss and a number of his ministers. The chancellor was beaten and shot and left to bleed to death, his captors refusing to permit a physician or a priest to be called. Without revealing the fact that they had murdered the dictator, the Nazis then surrendered on promise of safe conduct across the German border, being aided in the negotiations by K. Rieth, the German minister to Austria. When it was learned that Dollfuss had been killed the promise was revoked and the Nazis were locked up.



Engelbert Dollfuss

Meanwhile another small bunch of Nazis had seized the radio broadcasting office and had given out a statement that Dollfuss had resigned and would be succeeded as chancellor by Dr. Anton Rintelen, the minister to Italy. Rintelen was called to Vienna immediately, put in a cell and there shot seriously. Officials said he tried to commit suicide.

President Miklas called on Dr. Kurt Schuschnigg, minister of education under Dollfuss, to head the government, and he, together with Former Vice Chancellor Emil Fey and Prince Ernst von Starhemberg, the vice chancellor, took charge of the situation with the heimwehr to back them up. Soon afterwards it was announced that Von Starhemberg had been made chancellor. In the province of Styria and some other regions civil war broke out almost at once and the Nazis, strong in numbers especially in Graz, were desperately fighting with the regular army and the heimwehr.

Italy, France and Great Britain were conferring as to the best measures to take to carry out their pledges of last February that the integrity of Austria should be maintained. Italy, especially, was determined that the Austrian Nazis should not gain control of the country and was ready for armed intervention. Mussolini had 75,000 troops encamped near the Austrian frontier and personally assured Prince Von Starhemberg that he would defend Austrian independence. The French professed to look on the Nazi revolt as an internal event not warranting intervention at present, but the question of maintaining Austrian independence is one of the few in which they agree entirely with the Italians.

Naturally, everyone blamed Germany for the tragedy in Vienna, for the German Nazis have carried on a long and persistent campaign against Dollfuss, making use of the radio without restraint. Hitler's government, however, tried to avoid implication in the Vienna uprising. Minister Reith was recalled to Berlin because of his unauthorized action in helping the Nazi group, and Hitler appointed Franz von Papen to succeed him. The border was closed to all political fugitives from Austria. The German press, always under control, was careful not to express joy over the killing of Dollfuss.

On the side lines, waiting to see what course would prove most advantageous to themselves, were Czechoslovakia, Jugo-Slavia and Hungary.

The situation in central Europe thus was packed with dynamite almost as it was twenty years ago, and in all the world capitals the danger of serious international repercussions was recognized. Another general European war may be avoided for the present, but bloody conflict in Austria seemed certain.

FOR the first time in history a President of the United States set foot on Hawaiian soil when Mr. Roosevelt landed at Hilo. He went ashore there especially to visit the great Kilaeuea volcano, and being driven to the edge of the huge firepit of Halemaumau, he made a sacrifice to Pele, the fire goddess, by tossing a bunch of red ohelio berries into the crater. The city of Hilo gave the President a warm welcome and staged a pageant. Then he proceeded to Honolulu for the main events of his visit. His activities there included a review of 15,000 troops and an inspection of the Pearl Harbor naval base. He was entertained at luncheon by Maj. Gen. B. H. Wells, commandant of the army department, attended a picnic given by the Harvard club, ate dinner with Gov. Joseph Poindexter and, after a reception at the governor's mansion retired to the Royal Hawaiian hotel at Waikiki beach.

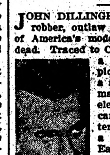
MINNEAPOLIS became the labor riot center of the country, the striking truckmen there and the police engaging in bloody fights; and, as in San Francisco, much of the violence was attributed to Communist agitators. The striking drivers sought the stoppage of all industry but only the cab drivers joined them.

Father Francis J. Haas and E. H. Dunnigan, federal labor conciliators, offered a plan of settlement which was accepted by the strikers, but the employers turned it down, asserting that the Reds were behind the strike and that they would have no dealings with Communists. Gov. Floyd Olson immediately declared martial law in the city and Hennepin county and Adjutant General Walsh of the National Guard became dictator. The decree even muzzled the press to a considerable degree. Four thousand guardsmen were mobilized and motor patrols toured the streets at intervals.

Following a conference of delegates, J. J. Noonan, president of the Licensed Tugmen's Protective association, announced in Detroit that a unanimous vote bound all unions and continued strike action in demand of an eight-hour day and a $2,400 yearly wage. Noonan said the next move was up to the shipowners, chiefly represented by John W. Cushing, Chicago, and G. A. Tomlinson, Cleveland.

About ninety tugs have been tied up at Great Lakes ports since the men left their jobs June 1, Noonan said.

JOHN DILLINGER, murderer, bank robber, outlaw and most notorious of America's modern desperadoes, is dead. Traced to Chicago, he ventured a visit to a moving picture theater to see a film of the life of a man who ended in the electric chair. As he came out of the theater federal agents and a police squad from East Chicago, Indiana, surrounded him. He drew his pistol and was instantly shot to death. Melvin H. Purvis, chief of the investigating forces of the Department of Justice in Chicago, led his men in this final and successful effort to get Dillinger, dead or alive. The outlaw had sought to disguise himself by having his face lifted and his hair dyed and by growing a short mustache. His finger tips, also, had been treated with acid. His identification, however, was immediate and certain.



John Dillinger

It was credibly reported that a woman had given the tip that resulted in the killing of Dillinger, but naturally, her name was not made public, for five members of his gang are still at large and might be expected to avenge their leader. The informant is due to receive at least a considerable share of the rewards offered by the governments of the United States, Indiana and Minnesota for information leading to the capture or death of Dillinger. These rewards total $15,000.

Attorney General Cummings in Washington was elated by the news of Dillinger's death. He warmly praised the work of Mr. Purvis and his men, who had devoted most of their time for four and a half months to the elimination of the desperado.

Three of the Dillinger gang besides the leader have been killed in battle with the law. Eight others are in prison, two of them under sentence of death.

WITH the collapse of the general strike in the San Francisco area and the defeat of the radical element among the workers, the longshoremen at all ports of the Pacific coast voted to submit to arbitration their differences with the ship owners. The latter had agreed to arbitrate and at the same time had promised to bargain collectively with other maritime unions. In the San Francisco bay region there were 108 vessels in port and the work of loading and unloading these went on rapidly. In other respects normal conditions there were restored. The "vigilante" bands continued their raids on Communist hangouts and the police arrested a number of radicals. The hope that the alien agitators captured can be deported was rather dashed by the attitude assumed by Secretary of Labor Perkins in the matter of deportations. She is waiting for the next congress to pass the leniency measure that would give her dictatorial power in these cases.

OLE H. OLSON is in the saddle as the acting governor of North Dakota and matters political were quieter in Bismarck. The house of the state legislature called into session by William Langer, the ousted governor, went home after naming a committee to consider impeachments. The senate couldn't muster a quorum and so it quit.

Acting Governor Olson declared a moratorium on every form of debt where the debtor can show inability to pay. It is designed to protect the farmer, small business man and home owner from foreclosure.

ONE HUNDRED miles of the Texas Gulf coast was swept by a terrific tropical storm that cost possibly a score of lives and did vast damage to crops and other property. An eighty-mile gale drove a tidal wave six miles inland, flooding towns, trapping the residents, breaking communication lines and smashing boats and buildings.

ALL American possessions except the Philippines, Samoa and Guam are now under the direction of a single government agency. The division of territories and island possessions, created by President Roosevelt under authority of the government economy act, has taken over control of Hawaii, Alaska, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin islands. Previously Puerto Rico was under the War department and the others under the Interior department.

The navy will continue to govern Guam and Samoa, and the War department will have charge of the Philippines until they accept independence voted them by the last congress.

IN AN executive order given out in Washington, the President set in motion his great reforestation program designed to help the plains area of the Middle West. He allocated $15,000,000 from the $525,000,000 drouth relief fund for the beginning of work on a $75,000,000 forest shelter belt a hundred miles wide and extending more than 1,000 miles through the heart of the drouth area from the Canadian border to the Texas Panhandle.

Announcement of the President's action and of the gigantic undertaking was made by Secretary Wallace, who authorized the forest service to use up to $10,000,000 of the $15,000,000 allocated to begin work on the project immediately.

AS PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT aboard the cruiser Houston was nearing Hawaii he took time to announce the membership of the national mediation board for the settlement of railroad disputes. The men he appointed are:

William M. Leiserson, Yellow Springs, Ohio, for the term ending February, 1936.

James W. Carmalt, Washington, D. C., for the term ending February, 1936.

John Carmody, now chief engineer of the federal emergency relief administration, for the term ending February, 1936.

The President also named Murray Latimer chairman of the railroad retirement board, created by a recent act of congress.

MOSCOW has finally realized that it cannot get trade credits in the United States until it in some way squares up the old czarist debts owed in this country. Therefore Ambassador Troyanovsky and Secretary of State Hull have begun preliminary conversations on the subject, at the instance of the Soviet government.

Russia owes the United States government $337,000,000 which this country lent to the czarist and Kerensky governments during the war. The Reds repudiated these debts when they seized control of Russia. The Roosevelt administration has firmly refused trade credits to the Soviet government until some sort of an agreement is reached on these debts. Although the Reconstruction Finance corporation has had an export-import bank set up for months to finance Russian trade, not a single loan has been made. Under terms of the Johnson act, which prevents new American loans to foreign debt defaulters, the bank has held that it cannot extend credit to Russia.

HAVING given nearly three months to the study of the nation's air defense, the board headed by Newton D. Baker has submitted a report which calls for immediate strengthening of the army air corps to meet "the most serious war threat against our country that can be conceived." The report says the army air forces are decidedly inferior to American navy and civil units that lead the world in strength and efficiency. The budget bureau and niggardly appropriations by congress are held to blame.

Newton D. Baker

Shortage of modern equipment, resulting from the reduced appropriations and stagnation in promotion of army air officers, the board warned, has affected the morale of the entire army.

The report scoffed at reports the United States was vulnerable to air invasion. It also opposed the unification of army and navy air forces under a separate national defense unit.

First giving assurance that its recommendations do not embrace a national policy of aggression, the board proposed:

1. A national aviation policy to be retained for a "reasonable" length of time.
2. Effectuation of the 1926 act which called for expansion of the army air corps to 2,320 planes with a larger ratio of combat units.
3. Steady program of procurement which would keep alive the nation's airplane building industry.
4. Drastic changes in the air corps regulations which would increase flying hours per pilot from 150 to 200 hours to 300 yearly; revisions in the promotion system for officers; increased training in flying under dangerous conditions and with instruments common on commercial planes.
5. Consolidation of the joint agencies of army and navy, such as the joint munitions board, the joint aeronautics board, etc., under the authority of the army and navy board functioning as a superior board for both departments.
6. Purchase of small inexpensive commercial planes for use in training pilots in group night flying.
7. Continuation of experiments with small non-rigid airships as partial substitutes for observation balloons.
8. Increase of the air corps personnel by 403 officers.

Minneapolis—For the first time in the history of the state, martial law has been declared. Governor Floyd B. Olson called the militia to Minneapolis when striking truck drivers and their employers failed to get together on a settlement. One striker was killed by police and fifty wounded in a clash before the troops took over the city. They will uphold law and order and prevent crowds and mobs from gathering. General E. A. Walsh, Brigadier General of the Minnesota national guard, is in charge of the 4,000 troops in the city.

The Diet So Helpful in Epilepsy

ALTHOUGH the cause of cancer has not been discovered lives are being saved daily by the use of the knife, the X-ray, and radium.

Similarly with epilepsy; although the cause has not been found, treatment of epilepsy is so successful that thousands of epileptics are being kept entirely free from attacks, and others have attacks that are extremely light.

The convulsions are prevented or kept under fair control in the majority of cases by cutting down on starchy foods, salt, and water.

Dr. D. S. Pulford, Sacramento, Calif., reports that by these methods alone, without the use of drugs, one-third of the intelligent and willing patients can be kept free of attacks, another one-third are benefited to the extent that they are willing to continue the diet low in starches, but one-third are not helped.

Notwithstanding the fact that this method of treating epilepsy was discovered in 1921, a "cure" is no nearer now than when this diet treatment was discovered.

Any danger from this diet is overcome by the use of yeast, viosteral and lime.

Another interesting point is that just as insulin has been found to have a number of uses besides saving the lives of diabetics, so also has this diet in which starches are decreased and fats increased been found of help in other conditions.

Doctor Pulford states that it is of help in the treatment of one-sided headache, in asthma and in infections of the bladder and urinary passages. Persons taking this diet are found to be more free of the common infections of the nose, throat and chest such as colds and influenza.

Further, in the acute infection ailments of childhood—measles, scarlet fever—the children appear to be better protected from the attacks or the effects of the attacks, when on this diet.

For the ordinary healthy individual the diet should be composed of one part meat and eggs to two parts fat—fat meat, butter, cream—to four parts starches—bread, potatoes, sugar, pastry.

In this special diet for epilepsy—the ketogenic diet—the meat and eggs are cut down slightly, the starches cut down to about one part (instead of four) and the fats are increased to make up for cutting down on the starches.

Children Below Normal Mentality

IT IS very gratifying to see the change in the treatment of what are called mental defectives, that is individuals whose mental ability is not up to normal or 100 per cent as it were.

Formerly they were simply thought of as "crazy," and the best treatment to separate them from their families and everybody else, as some of them had instincts that made them unsafe to those around them.

However, careful investigation shows that there are large numbers of feeble-minded persons whose behavior in the community is not any worse than that of persons who are not classed as mental defectives.

Nowadays they rank these defectives from the idiot up past the imbecile and the moron to those of normal mental ability.

This means that while the idiot and the next above him, the imbecile, may need special care in an institution, the next higher mentally, the moron, may be so helped that he can return to his family, and to the community, where, under ordinary supervision, he may lead a happy and useful life.

The whole thought then is that instead of thinking of these defectives as diseased or dangerous individuals, that we think of them as having just a little less mental equipment than the rest of us, and by giving this amount of mental equipment an opportunity to do its best, progress may be made in their development.

Dr. W. C. Sandy says that as most defectives will continue to be problems to the community, perhaps a menace if not cared for, an actual asset if trained, it means that there is urgent need for early discovery of these cases, correcting any physical defects, special training for certain cases, and removal of unsuitable cases to institutions.

In many cities now there are classes for those who are not as bright as the normal child, and the teachers in charge of these classes are specially trained for this work.

The thought then is that when a youngster doesn't seem to be able to keep up with his class, when he seems unable to concentrate, or when there are definite signs that he is not as old in his mentality as in his body, the parents should not be ashamed to recognize this, and should give the youngster every possible chance to be his very best self, even if this best is not just up to normal.

Wealth a Nuisance

Russia Erects Port on Bleak Coast of Siberia

Hopes to Open Ship Routes Through Arctic Sea.

Washington, D. C.—Along the bleak Arctic coast of Siberia, at the mouth of the River Lena, the Soviet government is constructing the most northerly port in the world.

"Though one of the six longest rivers in Asia, being almost 3,000 miles in length, the River Lena plays a minor role in the life of the continent. The sparse population of its basin, and its ice-jammed mouth on the dangerous, little-known Arctic ocean has prevented the Lena from taking part in world trade and limited it to internal commerce," says the National Geographic society.

"As Russian population spreads toward the Orient, however, this new port and the opening of navigation routes through the Arctic sea, may mean that the Lena will become a busy trade artery, through which will pulse the wealth of minerals, timber, and valuable furs of Central Siberia.

"Rising as a clear mountain torrent in the Baikal mountains, the Lena rushes northward between steep, forest-clad cliffs of red sandstone from 200 to 300 feet high and then between lower chalk cliffs, gutted with innumerable grottoes. At the town of Vitim, 876 miles from its souorce, it is joined by the Vitim river, noted for its gold mines.

Cliffs Resemble Castle.

"Its volume doubled, the Lena flows for miles through the dense taiga, a primeval coniferous forest stretching from the Arctic circle to Turkestan. Through the dark wild shrubbery run packs of howling wolves. Flying squirrels leap from pine to pine above prowling brown bears, sables and ermines.

"The monotony of the forested slopes is broken occasionally by the flickering red camp fires of hunters, tent settlements surrounding posthouses, and limestone or sandstone cliffs. One series of cliffs, the famous 'Colannades of Lena,' resembles a castle, whose battlements of red and green limestone strata stretch for miles along the river. Shortly beyond the junction with the rapid Olekma smoke from burning coal fields is seen rising from the banks of the Lena. These banks were long ago ignited by forest fires, giving rise to legends of volcanoes in central Siberia.

"The Lena valley has a wealth of minerals. Because its tributaries, the Vitim, Olekma, and Vilyui, flow through a region rich in gold, the Lena carries more of the precious yellow metal in its sands than perhaps any other river. Coal is found in several places along the Lena valley. In the region of the upper Lena are petroleum fields and whole mountains of salt. Near Yakutsk are silver mines, iron and zinc. Sulphur springs bubble on the banks of the middle Lena. Jasper is found at Zhigansk. Platinum is so abundant in the Aldan valley that natives are reputed to make bullets out of it.

Yakutsk Is Chief City.

"Yakutsk, the chief trading post of eastern Siberia, and an important fur market, is built on alluvial soil about two miles back from the Lena and about halfway between its source and mouth. When the ice breaks in June, floods sweep the town. For this season, many houses are built on high platforms. Yakutsk boasts a wooden blockhouse fort built in 1632 by Yermak, the Volga boatman who turned pirate.

"Yakutsk has a few brick office buildings, schools and churches, but most of the city is an unprepossessing collection of skin yurts (tents) pitched in spaces between snow-swept log houses. The few muddy streets become quagmires when the ground thaws. Many of the inhabitants are exiles, reindeer-riding Tungus, who breed cattle, and the more advanced Yakuts, who occupy the entire length of the Lena valley, farming on the fertile elevated banks almost to the Arctic circle.

"One hundred miles below Yakutsk, the confluence of the River Aldan from the right sweels the River Lena, temporarily, to a width of twelve miles, almost an inland sea. Not far below, the Vilyui enters the Lena on the left. Beyond are only insignificant tributaries and the Lena flows northward for 1,200 miles, a majestic stream, four to twenty miles wide.

"Steamers carry about 15,000 tons of freight a year on the Lena. To Yakutsk come barges bringing trade from the Sea of Okhotsk via the Aldan, and smaller craft with fox-skins from Bulun, with sables, ermine, and fossil ivory from the tundra of the Arctic. Skin-boats full of fish pass great rafts of timber, white steamers and leisurely ferries.

"The vast delta of the Lena covers an area of 8,800 square miles. It is formed partly by alluvial deposit, and partly by a group of ancient marine islands connected by silting or upheaval."

Clock in Deserted Cabin Runs 8 Years

Placerville, Calif.—An eight-day clock in a vacant mining cabin has been kept running for eight years.

When the mining company abandoned work in 1927, some one tacked a sign, "Please wind the clock," beneath the timepiece.

Fishermen and hunters using the cabin for overnight headquarters have been faithful in following instructions. Enough of them visit the cabin during the spring, summer and fall to keep the clock running.

During the winter, Ed Ramsey, who lives three and one-half miles away, makes a weekly hike to the cabin.

Winding the clock has become a sort of tradition.

Plan Steel Building With Roof Airport

French Show "Last Word" in Metal Construction.

Paris.—In times of peace prepare for war is obviously the motto that inspired the architect of the new exposition building to be erected at Issy-les-Moulineux on the outskirts of Paris along the Seine river.

Commissioned to erect a building that would be at once the last word in steel construction and at the same time suitable for showing all the different uses to which steel can be put, M. Leon-Joseph Madeline, the architect, has gone even further.

He designed a building with an airplane landing field on top and surrounded with lagoons, where hydroairplanes may land.

His design has been approved by the committee of distinguished architects.

The building chosen will cover twelve acres of land. The roof, by the use of cantilever arches, will be supported only by the four walls and yet will still be strong enough to hold up the great twelve-acre airplane field.

The ground about the building will cover another eight acres, including the large lagoons. In addition, the new building will solve a problem which has puzzled those interested in commercial aviation for a long time.

The building will make available, on the outskirts of Paris, a landing and taking off field that will improve immediately the prospects of airplane traffic. Issy-les-Moulineaux is on the subway and the railroads, and the Seine boats stop there.

What was originally intended to be an exhibition of steel, and still will be, will also be at a strategic point from the aeronautic standpoint. All the technical services, laboratories and industrial factories for the manufacture of airplanes in this district are located at Issy-les-Moulineaux.

Col. Theodore Roosevelt is the newly elected president of the National Republican club. In accepting the office he said: "The Republican organization must be re-made into a new party—a virile, fighting unit, liberal in the real meaning of the word—an opposition party that will oppose where the real interests of the nation call for opposition and that will support the President wholeheartedly in all constructive measures."

11-Year-Old Bridegroom Has to Attend School

Belgrade.—Europe's youngest married couple are Mustafa Bashitch, eleven, and Brisha Kasapovich, seventeen, of Bosnia.

Although a full-fledged husband, the young bridegroom has to go to school every day and his bride helps him with his lessons. He is in the third grade.

Early engagements are no rarety in Banovitch, which is a Moslem community. The above couple, however, break all records. In the village of Rasnu recently a young couple thirteen and twelve, respectively, became engaged. Both were in the same class at school. The bride-to-be's father, however, decided that the marriage should be postponed until they finished their schooling and the groom-to-be had become apprenticed to a carpet-weaver.

Only White House Dog Gets District Tag No. 1

Washington.—President Roosevelt has received a shiny brass tag bearing the numeral No. 1, to be worn on the collar of his dog Winks.

Winks, an English setter scarcely more than a year old, is the only dog at the White House now. Gus H. Gennerich, the President's secret service guard, is the owner of a half-grown American pit bull terrier, but the latter, known as "Pal," was not included in the White House kennels to the extent of receiving a special tag.

The No. 1 tag was brought to the President personally by Chapham M. Towers, collector of taxes for the district.

This is the first time the Presidential family has received only one dog license. Last year the White House kennels were composed of Major, the German shepherd dog, which was banished because of his fondness of biting; Meggie, little black Scottie belonging to Mrs. Roosevelt, which also was banished for the same reason, and a collie pup belonging to the children of Mrs. Anna Curtis Dall, in addition to Winks.

Ohio Man Given Permit to Kill Robin Raiders

Dumontsville, Ohio.—Cheery robins, believed by most ornithologists to be man's friends, are the bitter enemies of D. L. Swarts, who believes he has the only federal permit to kill them.

Swart's home is a bird haven. Doves, starlings, wrens and cardinals flock there. But robins—that's different.

"The robin is one of the fruit growers' most destructive pests. One day I counted fifty robins at my place, and every one was averaging a berry every five seconds," Swarts said.

"I get mad at them, but I can't shoot them until the fruit begins to ripen. Then I'm going to protect my property."

Swarts, who said robins cost him several hundred dollars' loss every year, applied last spring for a permit to kill the birds. The government granted it and the state conservation department approved.

Expert Finds Flowers Keep Better in Copper

New York.—If you want to keep cut flowers for a long time, try keeping them in copper containers. John Ratsek, floriculturist on the staff of the New York State College of Agriculture, placed snapdragons, stocks, roses, primroses and other flowers in such containers and by so doing he found that their life span was increased by one to three days. He explained that the copper kills bacteria which would decay the flowers.

Simple Christian Names for Children of Today

Curious changes in the fashions of bestowing Christian names are brought to light in a compilation made from the records of English public schools—schools, that is, corresponding to our Groton and St. Paul's and Exeter. There is apparently a going back to the old, simple names. There is a great predominance of the name John. Seventy years ago it occupied only fifth place in the lists; now it is almost double that of its nearest competitor, which is Peter. Peter, it seems, was not represented in any of the lists of 80 years ago. During that period Robert and Richard have more than doubled in popularity, and Michael and Anthony have risen from no place at all to the twentieth. One name that is steadily but not spectacularly popular is William, and we imagine that that might be found to be true in this country as well—at any rate among those who are British in their origin.

The English are not so inclined as Americans to name their children after heroes and heroines. We hear of no Horatio Nelson Smiths, no Arthur Wellesley Browns. The Williams are just plain Williams. William Ewart Gladstone Joneses are so scarce as to leave not a trace; so are the Benjamin Disraeli Thompsons. Among girls of the same classes there are few Victorias. There are, of course, thousands of Georges and Marys, but no George Windsor So-and-So, no Mary Windsor So-and-So. It seems to savor of presumption to name a young Britisher after one of the great or near great. It is only in those rare periods when the lion and the unicorn are fighting for the crown that Englishmen name their children to show their political partisanship. In the early days of the Georges, when the banished Stuarts had enough followers to make an effort twice, in 1715 and again in 1745, to wrest the crown away from the Hanoverians, any little James or Charles in the families of the nobility meant just as surely that his father was a Jacobin as every little George meant that his father was a Hanoverian whig.

It is perhaps as well that English children are not so generally named for heroes as ours are. One of these days Vice Admiral, the Hon. Reginald Aylmer Ranfurly Ernle-Erle-Drax-Plunkett, now chief in command of his majesty's fleet in North American and West Indian waters, may win a famous victory.—Boston Transcript.

Question Appeared to Verge on the Personal

A harassed-looking man entered a gramophone shop and inquired for some modern light music, preferably dance records.

"Very well, sir," said the assistant. "I understand perfectly. By the way, didn't you buy some records of operatic music here last week?"

"That's right," said the customer, miserably; "but my wife doesn't care for them. She wants something really snappy."

The assistant took down a number from the shelves.

"Have you had 'Seven Years With the Wrong Woman'?" he asked, naming a popular piece of music.

"No, twelve!" snapped the customer. "But, anyway, what the blazes has that got to do with you?"—London Answers.

Visitors Not Wanted

A celebrity and his wife left home one afternoon leaving only the two children to act as hosts to whoever might come in. When the parents hurried back, to their amazement, there on the door tacked up, read the children's scrawl: "The parents are out and the children do not wish to be disturbed."

Charles Isle Home of Strange Exiles

Story of Their Lives Is Almost Unbelievable.

Kansas City.—On a burned and blackened volcanic island that rises precipitously from the sea nearly 600 miles west of the South American republic of Eucador is gathered an astonishing assortment of queer human beings, says the Kansas City Times. An account of the lives of these persons on lonely Charles island furnishes an incredible, almost unbelievable story.

Weird stories of strange happenings on the bleak, lava-strewn bit of land that once was a convict settlement have been filtering into civilized haunts of man. Captains and crews of small trading vessels which put in at the island have told outlandish yarns of the inhabitants and their modes of living. So disturbing were the accounts that the government of Ecuador sent officials to the isolated point of land to investigate. The inhabitants of the island were questioned and their methods of living were inquired into. Then an official report of the investigation was filed with the Ecuadorean government and authentic information about the island was made available. And, surprising thing, the report substantiates the fantastic accounts that have been coming from the island!

Cast of Characters.

This barren, jagged, rocky island whose shores are washed by the equatorial waters of the Pacific has nine inhabitants. The cast of characters:

Frederich Ritter, of Berlin, eminent German physician, dentist and philosopher, who left a brilliant career in Germany to seek a modern Eden on the Pacific island.

His mate, Frau Dore Strauch Koerwein, who went to the island with him from her German home. She and Ritter forsook civilization to live a life of peace, which, they charged, modern civilization denied them.

Baroness Bousequet de Wagner, of Vienna, who went to the island after Ritter and his helpmate. Soon after her arrival she set herself up as "empress" of the isle and governs her "kingdom" clad usually only in abbreviated pink silk panties and armed with a .22-caliber pistol.

Philipson, Alonzo and Arends, men companions of the "empress" who came to the island with her.

A German couple, names unknown, and their infant child, born soon after their arrival on the desert island.

Ritter and Frau Koerwien were the first inhabitants of the isle. They landed there with a pick and shovel and a bag of seeds and perhaps a score of books, among them a volume of Lao-tse, the ancient Chinese mystic. Ritter refused an offer of a professorship at Freiburg, and left behind a brilliant career as an experimenter in nutrition when he left Germany seeking a lonely spot to "live his own life." He and his woman companion landed on the island in 1929 and have lived there since.

Will Not Touch Meat.

They are vegetarians and will not touch the fish, turtle eggs, wild pig, birds, wild goats, or other meat which is abundant on the island.

Fruits, vegetables, nuts and occasionally a little chicken forms their only food. Everything they partake is mashed into a pulp before it enters their mouths. A dentist, Ritter, has extracted all his teeth and those of Frau Koerwein. It is one of the theories that teeth are a cause of shortened lives. With their teeth out, he believes he and his companion may attain ages of at least one hundred and eight years. However, to assist them in their mastication, he has made sets of rubber teeth which they slip into their mouths at meal times.

The two food enthusiasts live either in a one-room shack built of rough timber or in a faded tent near a spring. Their homes are remote and accessible only by climbing a stony path which winds up a steep, mountainous way. At the foot of the path is a bell with a sign instructing chance visitors to ring it before they approach "The Hermitage," which is the title they have given their home. The signal is to warn the two exiles, as, when they are alone they wear no clothing. It is only when visitors appear—which happens on the average of from six to eighteen months—that they don a bit of covering.

"Taking the Profits Out of War"

By

LEONARD A. BARRETT

Numerous suggestions have been made for the abolition of war. Some of these have been tried but not with success. Public opinion is at present aroused with an enthusiasm which argues that if we would end all war, we must strike at the direct benefits which result from it. One of these is profits. "Take profits out of all war," seems to be the slogan. With this sentiment dominating the public mind we are not surprised to read press dispatches as follows: "One of the surest ways of preventing war would be to give the government the power to draft, not only men but wealth, industry, agriculture, and make them work without profit." The American Legion is quoted as having declared that when men are drafted, all machinery, even to the plow and tractor, and all farm implements everywhere in the country should be drafted also.

Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, whose judgment is respected by many persons, in a recent address, remarked: "Recapture all profits made by all industries engaged in war supplies above a small and reasonable return on the monies invested, and that all profits which are an incentive to war must be absolutely destroyed."

When we remember the fabulous fortunes which have been made out of the manufacture of war materials as well as the profits created by the sale of food stuffs and other necessities incident to war, we are inclined to believe that "taking the profits out of war" would help to remove one of the incentives to warfare. We have tried other schemes, why not try this one?

It should be remembered, however, that a disease is not cured permanently until the cause has been removed. The cause for war lies much deeper than just money profits. That profit is a large factor goes without question, but nations do not go to war just for the purpose of increasing their national treasuries. It seems to be a serious question if war can ever be abolished through the application of a rule of practice which is wholly negative. Many suggestions have been of this character. Do not do this or that, remove this cause or that cause. Very good so far as they go, but negations never get beyond a certain point in the development of any great object. Some commanding suggestion of a positive character seems to be needed. If the cause of war is "Greed," why not advocate the infusion of Christianity which has never yet been honestly tried.

The Household

By Lydia Le Baron Walker

ONE of the most difficult things to teach some children is responsibility while others have a natural sense of it. It is true that every normal person has to take to himself the responsibility for his or her actions in mature years, in fact, in all years except young childhood, when the responsibility for actions reverts to parents who are held accountable. When a person is irresponsible, he is not normal and must be treated as such. Parents who will pardon their children on flimsy excuses would resent being told their offspring was irresponsible. It is for them to help their youngsters to realize their responsibilities, and thus strengthen their characters.

This is no plea for severe punishment of children. This does not always, by any means, help them to feel responsibility. But it is written with the hope that there may be an awakening of this sense, for thereby law and order will be fostered. There is always a margin permissible for accidents which are not due to deliberate carelessness and foolhardiness. Recklessness is a form of irresponsibility either towards one's self or towards others, or both.

Courage is a totally different thing, for it is always used to avert calamity, while recklessness is taking a chance with the balance favorable to disaster. Courage is one of the traits of greatness, recklessness of little natures, chiefly, although it may permeate fine ones. It is sometimes the outstanding fault in what would be greatness without it.

Lack of responsibility is found in children who take no precautions to prevent a ball from smashing a window. Parents can stimulate responsibility by making the child earn the money to pay for the replacement of the glass. A first offense can be made easy to settle through letting the child be paid for running errands, etc., whereby he can earn the small sum needed. But repeated carelessness should not be allowed to pass so lightly.

Inculcating Responsibility.

Crime in children would be distinctly lessened if parents would help their children from a very early age to feel responsibility, not by thrusting responsibility on them, but by seeing that they take what falls naturally to little ones. Caring for pets stimulates responsibility. The knowledge that their cats or dogs, birds or rabbits, are dependent upon them for food and water and shelter, that without such care the pets would suffer, serves the double purpose of inculcating responsibility and helping the children to love dumb animals.

A large number of auto accidents are the direct results of lack of responsibility. Take a chance and it may come out all right, and when it doesn't and terrible suffering and deaths result, penalties must be paid, but life cannot be restored.

Anticipate Pleasures.

There are few people who do not enjoy looking beyond today in the prospect of good things that it is hoped will come; to the fulfillment of dreams; to a happy future, and a successful one. This can be a fine thing, since the person who cares to live without any forward glance is not a person of vision. Those who watch the trend in world affairs and have minds that comprehend clearly will see in the future many good things which have not culminated yet. Those who watch over a family of children, and who look ahead at their futures, will expect much that is good, but realize that, as parents, they have the present in which to prepare their little ones for such futures as they envision.

Michigan Naval Reserve Using Old Insull Boat

Detroit.—Sturdy naval reserve men now hustle about the decks of the training ship, the Truant, once the yacht of Samuel Insull, former Chicago utilities magnate.

The Truant was loaned to the Michigan Naval Reserve corps by the Illinois Naval militia which bought her from Insull ten years ago.

Insull had loaned it to the Illinois organization two years before the militia purchased it. The ship has the speedy lines that appeal to the sportsman, being 130 feet long, with a narrow beam of only 18 feet.

Mamma Coyote Knows How to Handle Young

Stevensville, Mont. — Anxious mothers can learn how to make children behave by watching a coyote on Carney Phelps' ranch.

Phelps said a mother coyote had five pups of belligerent nature. To keep them from fighting, she moved into an old badger hole with five tunnels leading from the main shaft.

By keeping one pup in each tunnel, "Ma" coyote kept them apart, except at meal times, when she and "Pa" saw to it that peace was preserved.

A PALE violet glow from unseen lanterns filled the room. The walls were hung with loose silken tapestry and in the corners stood carved oriental stands, a grotesque figurine atop each. From the mouths or nostrils of these incense smoke writhed languidly upward.

Mildred sat among many cushions in a massive teakwood chair and gazed through gauze at the shadowy face of Rubai Khan. Before his crystal ball he crouched, brooding fixedly upon its clouded depths. A multi-hued turban swathed his head. Below a short black beard was visible a cloak of gold brocade.

Rubai Khan raised his hands, bejeweled fingers widespread.

"I see," he murmured, "only that which I have seen before. I see you taking other paths, seeking to avoid the inevitable—and along these paths I see only sorrow and desolation. That is all, madame."

Mildred bent forward a little, nearer the veil of scrim which hung between them. Her voice was intensely eager as she asked:

"You mean that my happiness depends on this? You feel I must go back to my husband?"

"Yes!" The man spoke with emphatic conviction.

"But,"— in breathless anxiety—"are you sure he wants me back?"

Rubai Khan made a languid motion above the gleaming sphere.

"There," he said, "I have looked upon the two of you together and seen the contentment of each. Is he not tall, fair-haired, with eyes of deepest blue?"

She nodded.

"Then have no fear. He longs for you—lives but for your return. And now, the light fades; my journey for you into the realm of eternal truth is at an end. The spirit of Allah alone lives on. May it be with you ever."

His chin sank upon his breast and thus he remained, silently immobile. Mildred waited a moment, uncertainly, then rose and groped her way to the door. It opened on the anteroom through which she had come. She entered, pausing for a moment to blink at the shock of stronger light. A dozen or more women were waiting. They all seemed quite at home, Mildred noted, observing too the smart apparel which plainly indicated wealth.

She went forth into the glare and bustle of Hollywood boulevard, hastened to the nearest drug store, and telephoned Mary.

"Listen," she babbled excitedly into the mouthpiece, "something wonderful's happened! I'm going back to Don!"

After a second's silence.

"What on earth—" Mary began in bewilderment; but Mildred cut her short with:

"Never mind. I'm on my way now to see you and tell you everything. It's too marvelous!"

* * * * * * *

Rubai Khan stood up as the outer door closed behind the last of his patrons. Strolling to the wall, he pulled a cord that hung behind the draperies. They slid aside, revealing curtained windows and a number of electric fixtures. He flicked a switch and the bulbs sprang into life.

Shortly the door reopened; a man in business suit and small black turban came in. The crystal gazer was seated, holding a small mirror and expertly plucking whiskers from his chin by the handful. His smile of greeting to the other was radiant.

"Well, Jim, old boy," he cried, "it happened! She came at last, so the game's finished."

The fellow halted, gazing at him gloomily.

"Your wife?" he asked in a flat voice.

"Yep! First one today. She never had a suspicion, and she swallowed everything whole. I said right along it'd happen sooner or later, didn't I? She was always crazy about psychic stuff; I knew all I had to do was to get a reputation, and she'd be bound to come."

"But, look here, Don," the man called Jim protested, "you're surely not going to throw this thing over now, just when you've built it up into the big money? Think of the time and work you've put in."

Don Johnson shed the last of Rubai Khan, dropping the motley head-cloth in a heap on the floor. His blond hair was tousled above twinkling dark blue eyes.

"Guess you're forgetting," he reminded, "that it was all for one purpose only. Well, that's been accomplished, and I'm through. Think I want to go on slaving like this, when I can have a soft job managing Mildred in pictures? Not much! Why, I've even phoned a dealer to come get all this truck tonight."

* * * * * * *

"But, my dear," Mary was saying. "I simply can't understand why you're giving up everything this way, just because some ridiculous dressed-up fake advised you to. Maybe you have only gotten bit parts so far, but—"

"Darling, wait a minute." Mildred leaned forward, her eyes dancing. "I haven't told you the big secret. This 'ridiculous fake' is Don himself; I recognized him the instant I went in. And a whole bunch of rich women were there to see him. He must be making scads of money! Think I want to go on trudging around studios when I can live on that? Why, I only left him in the first place because he wouldn't work."

MYSTERY KILLING STILL UNSOLVED AFTER TEN YEARS

Boy and Girl Die in Pennsylvanian Mountains From Single Bullet.

Harrisburg, Pa.—In the top drawer of the desk of Maj. Lynn G. Adams, superintendent of the Pennsylvania state police, in the state capitol here are a bullet and its shell—the only clews to the identity of a rifleman who dealt death to two persons in a single shot May 17, 1924—ten years ago.

The rifle has never been found.

"Find that rifle and its owner—and we have the guilty man," Major Adams has said time and again.

The two victims were a high school senior, Harry Ganster, and his school teacher sweetheart, Leah Ellenberger of Hollidaysburg. She had come to Marysville, about ten miles from Harrisburg, to visit relatives and attend the graduation exercises.

In the early afternoon of May 17 they drove into the mountains north of Marysville in quest of wildflowers to be used for decorating the church for the baccalaureate services on the following day, Sunday.

They departed amid much merriment and with the warnings of friends "to hurry home early" ringing in their ears.

Found in Mountains.

Dusk came and the young lovers didn't return. As darkness came, young Ganster's parents and the relatives whom Miss Ellenberger was visiting became alarmed. Surely Ganster couldn't be lost—Ganster who knew these mountains so well. Something must have happened.

Searching parties were organized. Their quest was fruitless until 4 a. m. the following morning. Joseph Ganster, the boy's father, and George Albright, the young lady's uncle, burst through the leafy thickets in Lamb's gap on the mountain top, beholding a scene that seared itself indelibly into their memories.

A man's body—Ganster's—lay on the running board; a girl's—Miss Ellenberger's—slumped over the steering wheel. The tonneau of the car was filled with wildflowers. They had apparently been about to start the homeward journey.

Both had been dead for about eight hours, each shot through the heart. Ganster had been shot first, the bullet speeding on its deadly mission through a trench mirror, passing through the girl's body, lodging in her arm. Death had apparently been instantaneous.

The men were horror stricken. They stood motionless, open mouthed, wide eyed. Finally the awfulness of the tragedy dawned on them.

The police! Albright hurried back to Marysville, Ganster remaining with the bodies.

Automobiles carried scores of state policemen and newspaper men to the scene. Hundreds, curious, came from Marysville, Harrisburg, nearby towns, and the countryside.

Find Rifle Shell.

Police hunted footprints—roped off the murder scene, kept the crowds back as they literally sifted the soil for the shell or any other shred of evidence. They found the shell—and the shell was the same that had encased the death-dealing bullet. They were sure of this fact then; they are sure of it now. Ballistics experts have agreed on this point.

Then began the search for the killer—a search that has never ended to this day.

Scores of suspects were questioned to no avail.

Houses for miles around were searched for the rifle.

The police listened to countless versions of the crime by residents of Marysville and environs. Everybody had a suggestion. All were heard, checked. No success.

Who killed them? Police have never answered that question, perhaps never will. The killer, who accidentally or on purpose, snuffed out two young lives with the single pull of a trigger may have been one of the scores grilled by state police. If so, he made no damaging admissions. He may never have been suspected.

Mare That Lost Her Colt Adopts Motherless Calf

East St. Louis, Ill.—Rosie, a motherless heifer belonging to J. L. Edwards, East St. Louis, after weeks of orphanage has at last found a foster-mother—a mare, Dollie, belonging to Edwards' neighbor. Edwards bought the heifer when it was three days old, intending to put it in the maternal care of his cow. Blackie, however, would have nothing to do with the strange calf.

Several days ago Rosie broke loose. In a neighbor's field she descried the mare. Dollie was staked out for grazing and trotted over to get acquainted. "Dollie," who had just lost her colt, welcomed and befriended the lonesome little heifer, and when Edwards went to look for the stray he saw his feeding problems were solved.

Rosie is thriving and Dollie treats her adopted calf with perfect maternal solicitude.

Cat Adopts Rat Family

New Haven, Conn.—About the same time Andy Kovach drowned a litter of kittens belonging to his pet maltese cat, "Tabby," his two white rats ushered a family into the world. Tabby, stricken with maternal jealousy, immediately annexed the seven little rats and babied them as if they were her own.

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer, young professor of English literature and rhetoric, meets on the train a young man, Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy, as professor of mathematics and chemistry. They reach the railroad station, and meet Mrs. Denver, engaged as matron of the Academy.

The farmer continued gazing at them; then, as if this were none of his business, he chirped to his horses and the wagon moved ponderously forward. At the same moment they heard the distant chug of a motor, and a car swung into view from around a curve.

Behind it, clattering and swaying, appeared an open wagon, drawn by two bony white horses. The poor beasts evidently had been whipped down the mountain, and Janet, now seeing singularity in the most obvious circumstances, felt that even the horses in this wild region looked like the horses in a miracle pageant, lean and scarred and foam-flecked, with long, thin necks protruding toward scenes in which, animal-like, they scented disaster.

The man who drove the car was a septuagenarian in appearance; his companion, directing the white horses, a youngish fellow with a rather sullen air.

"The new teachers?" he asked with a kind of leer toward the imperturbable old man on the front seat.

"Yes—and as you have but one train a day here, it seems to me you ought to be able to meet it promptly," Fleming remarked, conscious that his structures were not altogether logical.

The man laughed and began putting the baggage in his wagon and adjusting a tarpaulin over it, with the comment that it was likely to rain. The old driver of the car indicated by a wave of the hand that they were to get in; Mrs. Denver and Janet, both secretly rather unhappy and nervous, took their places. But when the car began its journey into the hills the three newcomers lost for the time their anxiety in wonder over the view which every height or curve unfolded to their eyes.

"How far is it?"

"About five miles."

"Is it near a village?"

"It used to be—we're comin' to the ruins—a genuine deserted village. It was called Lostland, too, in the old days."

"Where do you get your supplies?"

"From the city—from Oteaga."

There was no time for further discussion; for now they were entering a road protected from curious visitors by high iron gates—newly painted, spanned by an iron grille bearing in letters once gilded the words "Lostland Academy."

They now beheld a great mansion looming beyond the immense pines, which were shaking in the wind. Built massively in the shape of a Greek temple, its high porch columns reached to the roof and supported a tympanum on which was bleaching a Latin motto in tall, black, faded letters which Fleming at Janet's request translated as the Biblical text, "Unless the Lord build the house, their labor is in vain that build it."

From the central body of the building, which was of brick, warm and time-toned and superimposed upon a basement of granite blocks, two wings of the same material jutted out; the whole covered with huge metallic green patches of English ivy carefully cut away from the long, narrow Georgian windows filled with small panes of glass flashing purple and violet iridescence. Lilac bushes almost as tall as trees partially hid some of the ground-floor windows. A strange hush was over the place, so deep, so profoundly unbroken by human voices or sounds, that the three passengers spoke in whispers as if not to introduce a discordant note. An evergreen walk, outlined by enormous, century-old box bushes, stretched to a far perspective. In that walk a tall man was pacing with a cloak over his shoulder. He looked both unhappy and reliable.

The car stopped before a majestic front door with a fan and side-lights filled in with delicate iron tracery. Shoe scrapers in ancient iron flanked the stone steps. Down these a man about forty years of age came to greet them; tall, clean shaven, with bright, restless eyes and an oversolicitous manner, he seemed more like a very keen financier than a schoolmaster. He was fastidiously dressed in a nearly new suit of leaf brown; his neat, dark-maroon tie held a scarfpin which Janet noticed at once, a cameleon carved in the shape of a tiny death's head. In his buttonhole he wore a gardenia, strangely reminiscent, Janet thought, both of funerals and festivities.

"Ah, my new teacher of English literature! my new teacher of mathematics! my new matron!" he said in a soft, almost paternal voice which filled Janet with a vague resentment. "Welcome! welcome! Down that avenue between the evergreen hedges you see the new professor of psychology—almost like Hamlet in appearance, isn't he? I told him he suited the old academy quite marvelously. Come in! come in!"

They followed him into a broad, imposing hall paved with lozenges of black and white marble, which at one place bore an insertion in green stone of a laurel wreath surrounding the letters in black marbles, "Lostland Academy."

On the white-paneled side walls hung dark oil paintings of stern and scholarly men in gown and bands, their yellowed hands resting on neat piles of books. Beyond them, one of a much later date, and apparently executed by a portrait painter of ability. It represented a man in middle life, clothed in the academic gown, with a crimson hood, and wearing the "mortar board." The gown was flying in the wind indicated by bending treetops and a wild sky of cumulus clouds, and the artist had put an expression in the eyes far removed from academic calm—a searching, hungry, sorrowful look. The background was the savage scenery of the neighborhood.

"The first three presidents of Lostland," Haskell said, with a wave of the hand toward the older portraits.

"Who is the fourth—the very sad gentleman who seems to be running from this spot?" Arthur asked boldly.

Haskell changed color, flashing a look almost of hatred at his new teacher. "The fourth is Dr. Jethro Bracebridge," he replied curtly.

"I see a lake in the background. Is there a lake near here?" Janet questioned.

"Yes, we have a small but terrifically deep lake almost back of the grounds; and from it recedes one of those wild gorges for which this middle section of New York state is justly famous."

"It has a waterfall, of course?" Janet remarked.

Haskell gave her a piercing look. "Are you clairvoyant? Yes, it has a fall—rather a high and terrible fall—a direct sheer drop of two hundred and twenty-five feet from an out-jutting ledge. Above this fall," he continued, his manner becoming more gracious, "the cliffs rise to a height of four hundred feet. Let me show you into the drawing room."

He ushered them into a long apartment filled with old-fashioned green-velvet covered chairs and sofa. Over the fireplace hung a painting of the old academy, representing it in the blandness of some forgotten summer, a coach-and-four drawn up before the pillared portico, and little girls in full skirts and pantalettes rolling hoops on the trim walks or playing battledore and shuttlecock on the shaved green lawns. Some old samplers hung on the wall, the work of children gone long ago to their rest. A large photograph album bound in green leather lay on a marble-topped console table. Mechanically Janet raised its cover.

"Don't touch that, please," Haskell said sharply.

She took her hand away—flushing with embarrassment. "I beg your pardon. I really have no special interest in the book."

"No matter, Miss Mercer. I suppose I'm fussy. Perhaps the old things shouldn't be about—but I like to have everything as it was in my stepfather's time—my stepfather, Dr. Jethro Bracebridge. I was very devoted to him. I watched over his last melancholy years when the old place was shut up. We'll have tea here, and then you can go to your rooms. You'll dine upstairs tonight."

Janet was beginning to breathe more freely. She removed her hat, and her soft, burnished brown hair released made a kind of aureole about her face. Her eyes with excitement and fatigue were at once bright and dark, and more deeply blue than Arthur had ever known a woman's eyes. Even Mrs. Denver looked at her with a kind of maternal admiration; and Arthur felt anticipatory jealousy of "Hamlet." They saw him pass the three front windows walking slowly, his cloak blowing in the wind. Then he entered; a young man with old eyes, a very sensitive, slightly repressed mouth, and a rather puzzled, almost apprehensive expression.

"I am Wilton Payne, the new teacher of psychology," he said simply.

Arthur shook hands with him, and introduced him to Janet and Mrs. Denver. Upon Janet his eyes rested with friendly quiet admiration.

"And you, I believe, Miss Mercer, are to bring Crashaw, and Chaucer, Burns and Shelley to this ancient academy?"

"I hope so!"

"In all my life I never knew a place so silent," Mrs. Denver announced in a hushed voice and with a look over her shoulder, as if she were afraid of some one creeping up behind her. "Where are the scholars?"

Wilton Payne and Arthur exchanged glances, and as if reading each other's thought, looked nervously away. The former arose from his seat and stared out of one of the windows.

"I wonder if houses possess mental and emotional states approximating those of a long line of occupants. This place seems absolutely vibrant to me; as if people were hurrying through the corridors, and yet I haven't seen a soul since I arrived an hour ago."

A rather obtuse-looking country woman entered with a tea tray and put it down on the marble-topped table which occupied the center of the room.

CAN DETERMINE SEX OF UNBORN

Russian Scientist Announces Important Discovery.

Sex determination, breeding male or female animals as desired, has been accomplished.

Baby rabbits, 180 out of 200 having the sex that was planned for them, so far constitute living proof of the success of the method. Several hundred births among Russian cattle and swine this summer will show whether the method has practical value for cattle breeding, as is expected by Prof. N. K. Koltzoff, the biologist who devised it.

The technique will be successful in bringing human children of the desired sex also, Professor Koltzoff claims. But the human application is minor and chiefly sentimental in his opinion. Parents should be happy whether their baby is a boy or a girl, says the professor, who himself is childless.

His chief interest is in its application to cattle breeding. In nature the sexes of animals are about equally divided. To eliminate almost half that are useless for increase—the males—and to supplant them with progeny-bearing stock spells an annual profit or growth dividend of 50 to 80 per cent.

Professor Koltzoff's method is based on the discovery of American investigators, Prof. E. B. Wilson of Columbia, Prof. E. C. McClung of the University of Pennsylvania, and the late Dr. N. M. Stevens. These investigators showed that sex in animals is determined by the fertilizing elements which are equally divided into those having male and those having female potentialities.

These elements are living cells, and Professor Koltzoff found that, like other cells, they carry an electrical charge. Accordingly he was able to separate them by passing an electric current through them, and to produce male or female rabbits, according to which electrically separated group of elements he used to impregnate the rabbit mothers.—Science Service, New York World-Telegram.

MOVE TO CHECK OVERPLAYING OF INSANITY PLEAS

The American people have long been convinced that the insanity plea in criminal courts is decidedly overworked. It is gratifying and not a little surprising, therefore, says the St. Paul Dispatch, to learn that the psychiatrists, whose science has contributed most to the furthering of the insanity plea, are now making an attempt to close this loophole in the law.

At a recent annual meeting of the American Psychiatric association in New York a committee report was read advocating radical reforms in legal and penal procedure in capital cases in which a plea of insanity had been entered by the defendant. It was recommended that "the judge shall eliminate all evidence of the mental condition of the defendant except such evidence as makes the mental disease so obvious a lay jury can understand it." Time and again juries have been mystified by the clinical subterfuges and technicalities of insanity pleas in criminal trials. On too many occasions the twelve good men and true have been overwhelmed by psychological folderol and have permitted justice to be cheated.

To the ordinary run of citizens who make up jury panels there are mentally only two kinds of people, the normal and the crazy. The various grades and degrees of mental and nervous disorders which is the psychiatrist's field he comprehends not at all. When an insanity plea is entered the jury merely wants to know whether the accused is or is not responsible for his acts. Keeping such evidence in an understandable form will help the juries and put a limit on the abuse of insanity pleas.

"It Keeps My Skin So Smooth"

Long before this contest was announced, one girl wrote, "My skin is delicate and to keep it soft and well-cleansed, I must use a soap of unusual mildness. That's why I prefer Camay to any other beauty soap. It keeps my skin so smooth and clear."

This letter may give you a hint for your entry.

Dreams Come True! WITH CAMAY THE SOAP OF BEAUTIFUL WOMEN

Guadalajara

Public Letter Writers in Guadalajara.

Prepared by National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.—WNU Service.

AT DAWN comes the clang and peal of countless bells. The din is startling in its unexpectedness. It sounds like a battle call—or an alarm that Guadalajara is burning.

Hurriedly you get up and go out on the hotel balcony.

"All these churches," says a voice at your elbow, "and every bell with a different tone." It is the man from the room next to yours, a Spanish friend from the sugar plantations, in pajamas and straw sandals.

"I first came here more than 40 years ago, from Spain," he adds. "We made the last stretch in a four-mile stagecoach on leather springs, after a night battle with bandits. We got in just at dawn, with these same bells ringing. Nothing here has changed much—the same people, habits, churches, and bells. Even the bats are still here. Read at night, and your light draws the moths; turn out the light, and the bats fly in to eat the moths. But they don't eat their wings—next morning moth wings are all over your floor!"

In the street below now black-garbed women, their heads covered, are walking quietly to mass—women of all classes, peon and aristocrat, but hardly any men. Rattling heavily, a water cart turns the corner, sprinkling the streets and raising that ammonia smell of old adobe towns where humans and beast have long crowded the absorbent soil too closely. You meet that same smell, mixed with the scent of roasting coffee, when at early morning men wet the dusty streets of Aden or Baghdad.

"Ice!" "Bread!" "Morning paper!" All voices of the awakening city as truly as cackles, crows, grunts, and squeals are the alarm clocks of the farmer. Before the doorway halts an old man on a mule, carrying two big cans. A sleepy girl, with a clay jar, comes out and buys some milk. And the man rides on, calling his singsong "Leche, leche," milk, milk, in a despairing wail, more like a cry of pain than an invitation to buy.

Turkeys for Sale.

Now a country boy in a ragged straw hat comes driving a flock of turkeys. He carries a long stick, with a whiplike piece of string on one end, for flicking any errant turkey on the neck. He urges them on by hissing sounds, his tongue against his upper teeth, in the familiar Indian warning. They market thousands of turkeys on foot here, as in parts of Texas, the inquisitive, shapely birds marching with quick, graceful strides, necks jerking sharply with each step. One strutting gobbler, with pendent red wattles long as a prophet's beard, ruffled his bronze plumage and dragged his wings.

By the time you dress, clap your hands for coffee, and read a Mexican paper still damp and smelling of fresh ink, all Guadalajara is swarming. Tramcars are crowded; so are busses.

Bobbed-haired senoritas, in bright organdie, silk hose, and high heels, chatter and giggle their cheerful way to work in stores, beauty and curio shops, at switchboards or typewriters. Many are pure Andalusian types with blue eyes and blond hair, small, shapely hands and feet. The ease and joy with which man may look upon womankind in Guadalajara are proverbial. "In all Mexico, no others are so fair."

"Surely St. Peter must have opened the gates of heaven to let down such a beautiful damsel," Mexicans say when a maid of pulchritude is passing.

Along with the crowd, ogling the girls, come sleek young bank clerks, bookkeepers in the brewery, the factories, motorcar and other agencies, spick and span in flannels of Hollywood cut, carrying sticks, smoking pungent native cigarettes.

The sidewalks of Guadalajara! Walk them at this hour and you see the city eye-high and close up.

Workmen idly dig up the pavements, as always; traffic police in white gloves blow whistles and wave cars to stop. And they do stop; for one dispute with an alert Guadalajara traffic cop and the big jail yawns for you. On an open space soldiers are drilling and women wait before the colossal prison to get in at visiting hours. "They built the jail big enough to hold everybody in town, as a warning," is a local saying.

Workers in Clay.

Through the suburbs you meet more groups coming to work. In a flower garden a sandal-footed man is setting out young plants to make a fancy pattern of birds and flags.

From the tail of his big black dog, asleep beside him, an old Indian artist plucks a few hairs, twists them deftly into his tiny, frayed brush, and resumes painting eyebrows on a clay head of Pancho Villa, master outlaw.

Other heads, new and shiny, stand on a board: Obregon, Carranza George Washington, Henry Ford—and an American Shriner in a red fez.

Pose for your own bust, if you like, and watch your nose and ears form swiftly from the mud. In half an hour old Pandura (Hard Bread), famed Indian sculptor, makes a fair likeness.

"This Guadalajara clay art is fragile and hard to ship," says a buyer from the States. "But it sells well. Not the busts so much, but these urns, vases, and water bottles, in old Aztec patterns. These dancing girls are good, too, in their wide skirts and big sombreros."

Around Tonala village and the suburb of San Pedro Tlaquepaque, Indians have worked in clay from time immemorial. The Spaniards found them at at it, making dishes for domestic uses, making idols, images, and figurines of men and beasts.

Untaught, and working far from the patter of studios and talks on art, these Indians produce excellent sculpture. Tiny pack mules, street hawkers, market women with chickens and baskets of fruit, vaqueros on rearing horses—all are formed and painted with fidelity to life. Sophisticated and erotic pieces also appear, with miniatures, ornaments, and vessels carrying a raised fretwork of deer, rabbits, ferns or palms. A fat clay pig, hollow, with a slit in his back through which coins can pass, is much sold as a child's savings bank. Happily for the child, these figures break easily; all you have to do is drop them.

San Pedro Tlaquepaque, once the retreat of Spanish wealth and fashion, is linked with the city proper by tram, through an old customs gateway. Country people taking things into town to sell had to pay a tax in the old days to pass this gate.

A tiny, bright-eyed nurse girl, certainly not more than ten, comes by, carrying a big fat baby. You feel the baby should get down, for a change, and carry the tired little girl.

Gambling Is Prevalent.

On the curb's edge, three soldiers are playing cards with a greasy deck. One man deals, calling "Ocho de espadas," eight of spades, and other faces as they turn up.

Gambling is not thought a vice. Men accost you, holding up yard-long strips of colored lottery tickets. You can buy a whole or part ticket. Such peddlers work on a commission for the official lottery, which holds regular drawings, is run in a strictly business manner, and devotes net profits to charities.

Police appear dragging two disorderly men, one badly cut in a street fight. Certain knives here are made to fight with. Any battle-scarred mining or cow-ranch veteran will tell you he'd rather face a gun fighter than a Mexican trained with the knife. This business of knife fighting is full of fancy tricks. One is to throw the knife; another is suddenly to hit your opponent in the face with your hat, and then stick him while he's off guard. Defense work is equally skillful. The trained fighter wraps his serape around his left arm, or even grasps his big hat by the inside of the crown, using serape or hat as a shield, while thrusting with the knife. In "Old Mother Mexico," Harry Carr tells of a Mexican knife battle, fought to a draw, in which the heavy wool serapes were cut to shreds, but neither man hurt!

After the knifemen comes a boy leading a very skinny horse. "Play us a tune on your harp," shouts a clerk, a Mexican witticism implying that the horse is so bony his ribs look like harp strings!

Up the street past your hotel, late in the night, comes a squealing orchestra, preceded by three young men. One of this trio is celebrating his birthday. Hiring musicians to play in one's honor is good form, in keeping with established social practice. If you write a poem, win a horse race, or vanquish a rival, it is customary to hire a band and stroll from one cantina, or saloon, to another, or past the homes of your friends, with the music playing.

Here music seldom ceases, and most of it is good. This makes you wonder how the many organ-grinders earn a living, till one explains: "They are subsidized by a fund willed to the city to insure free hand-organ music in perpetu

Made National Beauty Spot

Florida Everglades, Set Aside as Park Area, Will Open Tropical Wonderland to Americans and Visitors From Other Countries.

Approval by congress of the vast Everglades area in Florida as a national park opened the way for development of an interestingly tropical project which will rank in size and significance along with the Yellowstone and Yosemite attractions.

Known by most persons only as the home of the Seminole Indians and as ideal territory for hunting and fishing, the Everglades park holds a strange lure for the adventurer and the student of nature, once they have forced their way into the pristine interior.

The park area is about twice the size of Rhode Island, embracing more than 2,000 square miles. It offers an incalculably valuable study of plant and animal life in a distinctly tropical environment.

It sounds like fairyland fiction to say that the Everglades contain orchids so large that they have to be carried by four men, but that is the report of a scientist, Dr. John K. Small, head curator of the New York Botanical garden, and other responsible persons who have made their way into this exotic jungle area. Doctor Small, whose interest in the Everglades began more than thirty years ago, found orchids there with stems 15 feet long, on which were growing as many as 1,000 flowers. More than 25 varieties of orchids grow there. Many carloads of them have been shipped to northern markets during the past few years. It is estimated that some of the plants are 500 years old.

A large part of this area consists of thousands of islands and lakes and winding waterways teeming with many kinds of fish. One enthusiastic explorer, impressed with the heavily carpeted lands, said 10,000 persons could march through there and leave no footprints.

Mangrove trees there, many of which reach a height of 100 feet, have a strange beauty. There is a forest of them which covers 100 square miles. Coconuts, of course, are plentiful, and it is an odd fact that oysters grow on trees in this area. The current in the rising and falling salt water streams flows in such a manner as to make it possible for oysters to attach themselves to the surface roots of the mangrove trees.

Besides mangroves, this little-explored expanse of forest and waterways includes maple, ash, sweet gum, oak, magnolia, pine, cypress, gumbo-limbo, mahogany, lignum vitae and other species of trees. These, together with the rubber trees and many kinds of strong trailing vines, form such a dense living barrier that many parts of the Everglades are almost impenetrable.

Thousands of huge sea turtles, weighing from 100 to 300 pounds, come ashore at night to lay their eggs in the sands and leave them there to hatch. Natives have made extensive commercial use of both the turtles and the eggs, for one turtle lays from 150 to 200 eggs. The turtles are caught as they move between the water and their nests. Hunters hide until a turtle is several feet away from the water, then they rush up, flop her over on her back and leave her paddling the air until daylight, when they return and take their prey to market.

Perhaps the most impressive feature of this project, so far as the student of bird life is concerned, is the mysteriously beautiful flight of thousands of birds to and from their feeding grounds and roosting places. When they spread their wings and sail between the sun and a spectator, they offer a fascinating spectacle. They become a veritable cloud concealing the sun, their graceful bodies sailing in regimented rhythm and their wings reflecting a delicate pink.

Among the birds to be seen there are egrets, herons, cranes, ibis, flamingoes and spoonbills. Animals such as bear, deer, fox, wildcats, panthers, raccoons and opossums are there in large numbers, as are alligators, snakes and mosquitoes.

Florida's legislature has already made available 325,000 acres for the park, and the Royal Palm State park has been offered by the Florida Federation of Women's clubs. Donation of additional lands has been assured. Visitors will be able to travel by road for many miles, but they probably will find the travel much more interesting when done in small boats. This will give many indigent Seminoles a permanent means of livelihood, for they are the only persons sufficiently familiar with the territory to serve as guides.

Instead of encroaching upon the last retreat of Indians who have, many claim, been imposed upon and exploited, the Everglades park project will serve as protection for them in several ways, according to plans being worked out by the bureau of Indian affairs.—New York Times.

Sensitive Pearls

In the settling of an estate which had a Brockton inception there was a division of personal jewels between two of the heirs. One took a string of pearls that had originally been valued at around $10,000. A Boston firm dealing in gems pronounced the once flawless pearls as salable at not more than $600. The wearer of the gems had been a sufferer from a malady for which she had taken a comparative modern remedy, and that remedy, the jewel experts said, had acted upon the pearls through the skin they touched and had robbed them of their luster. A pearl is singularly sensitive to conditions in the body of the wearer.—Brockton Enterprise.

NEED OF CENSUS TO SHOW VITAL NATIONAL FACTS

A good deal of the governmental, business and social activities of any community depends upon accurate knowledge of the number of inhabitants which compose it.

Such vital information is seriously lacking these days. A leading life insurance company discusses the subject in a statistical bulletin under the heading, "How Many Are We?" Apparently there is no reliable information regarding the population of the country as a whole or of any of the states or large cities. The depression is to blame. Formerly it was comparatively easy to make population estimates in the years between the decennial census, but today it is difficult to make even an approximate guess. The simple and usually reliable methods then employed no longer are suitable to the sudden and fundamental changes which have taken place in our population during the last few years. Economic conditions have pushed down the birthrate, the tides of immigration have reversed, and millions of people are coming and going in search of work, never settling down in one place long enough to be counted. Washington has given up and is no longer preparing the annual estimates of population.

Meanwhile business men and governmental officials are clamoring to know the population facts about the various states and cities. It is information necessary for the apportionment of representatives, taxes, water supply, schools, roads, transportation, police services and for the conduct of industrial and commercial enterprise. Only another federal census can solve the problem, and the suggestion has arisen to take one in 1935, or five years early.—St. Paul Dispatch.

Views and Reviews

[The views below do not necessarily coincide with the official beliefs of this publication; they are merely personal observations.]

Last week nineteen Minneapolis truck employers started court action to force Governor Olson to suspend martial law in the Minneapolis truck drivers' strike. Regardless of the outcome, this action brings to mind a couple questions:

What would the employers have said if the Governor had NOT declared martial law—if he had let the strike run wild? Since he did declare martial law and called out the National Guard, would the employers have felt better if he had crushed the strike ruthlessly, sending the strikers back defeated and broken, maimed and killed, cowed into submission? The duty of the National Guard is to preserve the peace, not to favor any faction. Too often in the past the National Guard and the State Militia have been used to break strikes, thus gaining the name of being "the police force of the industrialists."

The situation has been slightly different in Minneapolis. Floyd B. Olson has shown that the National Guard need not always take sides in such a struggle. His role has been difficult. As governor of the people, he must be as impartial as possible, and maintain a liberal mind. Because he has attempted to give labor a break, he has incurred the wrath of the industrialists and their servile lackeys, the daily newspapers. Their reasoning is simple: if he is not for them, he must be against them.

Even if the demands of the strikers were unreasonable (which they are not), the employers show poor judgment in refusing to deal with them. The cry of "radicalism" is merely an attempt to befog the issue. Even if the strikers were radicals (which they are not), they still are human beings, exercising their rights. They can hardly be blamed for refusing to quit before settlement is made.

As it turned out, the Court decided that Floyd B. Olson was justified in declaring martial law; that it was preferable to mob rule; and that, therefore, the action of the truck employers be thrown out of court.

Cheated of satisfaction here, the reactionary dailies started another boom—that the National Guard is "rotten" with Communists, and that a Communist uprising is due this week. The ghost walks again! -B.C.H.

Gerhard Raaum Wed

The following was taken from the Vashon Island News-Record, Vashon, Wash., and may be of interest to many here:

The marriage of Miss Valborg Sarvold, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Victor Sarvold, to Gerhard Raaum, son of Rev. and Mrs. O. Raaum, was solemnized the evening of July 4th, at 8:30 o'clock in the Colvos Lutheran church. Rev. O. Raaum read the marriage rites for the beautiful candlelight ceremony.

A reception followed the wedding ceremony at the Sarvold home and about 100 persons were present.

It is of particular interest that July Fourth was chosen for their wedding day by the young couple because of the fact that the parents of the bride, as well as the parents of the groom had been married on July Fourth.

Mr. and Mrs. Raaum left immediately after the reception for a short honeymoon trip, after which they will be at home to their friends in Beulah Park.

Five Weeks on Wheels

High Lights of An Auto Tour to the West Coast

by Hans O. Hanson

I. Through a Dry Country

Early in the morning of Friday, July 6, we started our long planned trip to the West Coast. There were six of us—my wife, the three children, my brother Pete and I—and the Chevrolet was loaded down with a full tank of gas, camping equipment and necessities for the long trip.

We pulled out of Holt about 6 a. m. that morning headed for the big Rockies.

Our first hop was to Minot, North Dakota, which we reached soon after dinner. There we called on Nels Skiple, my wife's uncle; and we visited there until six o'clock in the evening. The state fair was in progress at Minot; and that, combined with the recent Langer doings, provided plenty of conversational material.

Leaving Minot, our next stop was Hamlet in the western part of North Dakota, which we reached late the same night. You readers probably will not believe me when I say that western North Dakota looks like a desert. Not a green living thing to be seen—even the trees have died and stand naked and forlorn on the bare prairie. The day we were at Hamlet, a wind was blowing, and the dust and dirt drifted like the sands of a desert. Practically every blade of grass and most of the sod had long ago disappeared, so the topsoil was like a plowed field—black and lifeless. People were obliged to keep all windows and doors tightly closed, to keep out the dust.

You can imagine that feed and hay were high priced out in that country. The government was buying up most of the cattle for slaughtering, or for shipping to points where feed could be had. At Hamlet, we stayed at the homes of two of my wife's cousins, Mrs. Frank Hankey and Mrs. Albert Hankey. The Hankey brothers were haying in a dry lake-bed near their farms, which was the only vegetation growing for a good many miles around. Luckily, this old lake bed contained nine thousand acres of good hollow-stem hay. In normal years, it had several feet of water in it and, only the outer shores had hay that could be cut. Called "The Meadows" it was known for a long distance, and farmers came in to buy stumpage or hay. Haying was practically the only farm work going on at that place and it paid well, too. Those that had hay stumpage to spare sold it at $340 cash per forty acre plot and some sold it for $12 a ton in the wind-rows.

It was said that even water had a price out there. All in all, western North Dakota has lost its glamor and those out there whom are still so fixed that they can, are moving to other sections of the country. North Dakota has been a good productive state and, we, hope for the benefit of those who are sticking there, that conditions will change.

Bidding farewell to the Hankeys, we again headed southwest, directly into the dry desolation; and finally we went thru the Bad Lands. The Little Missouri river flows thru these Bad Lands and the scenery is just wonderful. At Medora, N. Dak., where Teddy Roosevelt once lived, stands a historic old French chateau which was once the home of a rich Frenchman who built the first packing plant in that state. The plant was bought by eastern packers when it was completed and burned to the ground the day after the deal was closed. Only the big brick chimney remains as a monument of what would have been a large industry in that little town on the N. P. Ry.

We are now at the Montana line and will take you from there next week.

Mrs. N. B. Bagne and son left Monday for Mahnomen, after visiting with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. K. T. Knutson for some time.

Mr. and Mrs. Conrad Braaten and daughter Fae, and Mrs. Gilbert Braaten of Ross, and Mrs. Wm. Lindahl and daughters Wanda and Eldine of Newfolden spent Monday afternoon at the Otto Johnson home.

Mr. and Mrs. H. O. Hanson and family and Pete Hanson returned home last Thursday evening from a seven thousand mile auto tour of ten of the western states, and a visit with friends and relatives on the West Coast.

Marshall Ness returned home this week from a hospital in Thief River Falls, where he underwent an operation for a ruptured appendix, on Tuesday July 31. He was a very sick man for a while, but is up again now and coming along fine.

David Johnson and Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Bakken and daughter Carmen of Fargo, N. Dak., spent Saturday night and Sunday here visiting with friends and relatives. They were accompanied back by Mrs. David Johnson and daughter Rosamund, who have spent several weeks here visiting at the O. Christenson home here.

The End of the World

Among other things resulting from the drouth come a few good stories, one of the best of which, according to the Co-Operative Shipper, goes like this: A persistent life insurance solicitor was annoying a man down at the stockyards. Finally, to get rid of the agent, he told him he belonged to a certain religious sect which had just received word that the world was to end July 1st, 1934. Sitting near by was a farmer boy who had just sold some starved cattle for about 1½c a pound. He overheard the remark about the end of the world. "That," he spoke up, "is about the best news I've heard in a long time."

The Reason Why - -
The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.
For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.
If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

New Invention Eliminates Changing Dials on Radio to Hear Various Programs

A robot radio which tunes itself on and off different stations, according to a pre-selected schedule, starting and stopping and changing programs automatically over a twelve-hour period, has been perfected by A. Atwater Kent, radio engineer and manufacturer.

Once set, the robot or tuneomatic radio provides any combination of programs desired, and after turning itself off at night will go back on again in the morning and serve as an alarm clock. It looks like any other large all-wave radio except for an electric clock set into the front panel. While the mechanism is described as a complicated problem in radio engineering achievement, the operation is simple.

A series of small holes around the edge of the clock's face mark the quarter hour periods and serve as connecting channels between the time clock arrangement and the tuning mechanism. The latter has sixteen outlets in the form of miniature telephone switchboard cords, two to each of seven stations and providing for fourteen different program periods, with two extra cords for intermission periods. The cords are plugged into the holes at the desired program periods, and the radio then operates automatically, shifting from station to station and program to program, stopping itself and starting again exactly as scheduled. If the self-tuning mechanism is not turned on, it operates like any other radio.

Imperishable Records

Indestructible records of picturesque and historic places in England are being preserved for future generations by printing etchings on clay, says Popular Mechanics Magazine. After the clay is fired and glazed, the etchings are printed on the tiles, each of which is 6½ inches by 5¼ inches. A new method makes possible the production of strong line and delicate color.

Pimples on Face Never Could Shave

Healed by Cuticura

"Three years ago my face and arms broke out with a skin eruption that was followed by large, red pimples. They festered and went all over my face and arms. They itched and burned and I could never shave. I lost much rest at night with them.

"Nothing I tried helped very much. Then I saw an advertisement for Cuticura Soap and Ointment and purchased them. I used about four cakes of Cuticura Soap and one and a half boxes of Cuticura Ointment and now I feel like a new man. I am completely healed." (Signed) Harry R. Von Hindenburg Dies and Hitler Seizes Presidency of Germany—Roosevelt's Economic Security Program Is Being Formulated.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

PAUL VON HINDENBURG, "German Gibraltar," has gone to his long rest, and Adolf Hitler is now absolute ruler of the reich. Immediately after the death of the president at his summer home in East Prussia was announced the cabinet met and put forth this decree:

Paul Von Hindenburg

"The reich government has passed the following law, which is hereby promulgated:

"I. The office of the reichspresident is united with that of the reichschancellor. In consequence thereof, powers heretofore exercised by the reichspresident are transferred to der fuehrer (Hitler) and the vice chancellor (Franz von Papen). He (Hitler) determines who shall be his deputy."

Hitler for the first time became also the commander of the reichswehr or regular army, and Gen. Werner von Blomberg issued an order that every soldier must pledge absolute loyalty to the death to Hitler.

Ever since his great victory at Tannenberg, early in the World war, Von Hindenburg had been the idol of the German people and their grief over his death was general and sincere. Their expressions of sorrow were mingled with veiled but anxious discussions concerning the possible effects on the reich of the aged leader's death and the assumption of full power by Hitler. The president, though forced to give the Nazi chief the chancellorship, had been a constant check on extreme Nazism, and he had the full confidence of other nations that has never been accorded to any other German since the war. As Jacob Gould Schurman, former American ambassador to Berlin, puts it:

"Now that Von Hindenburg is gone, no successor, having regard to his achievements, his prestige, and his tried and tested character, can, at least for a considerable time, create an atmosphere equally favorable to diplomatic negotiations with foreign powers."

Doctor Schurman, however, does not believe the Hitler regime is in danger of falling at this time. He says the German people are not naturally rash and revolutionary and probably will give Hitler a chance to seek a solution of the economic problems that confront the country.

Von Hindenburg, who was eighty-six years old, was a patriot all his life, a veteran of three wars and a marshal of the empire under Kaiser Wilhelm. He was a hard fighter but a kindly gentleman. He supported the republic when it was created but at heart he was always faithful to the self-exiled kaiser. His last days were clouded by the realization that he had failed in the effort to really check Nazism.

CHANCELLOR SCHUSCHNIGG of Austria appeared to have the Nazi revolt completely under control and was making overtures to the Social Democrats and the workers, the latter being warmly praised for not taking part in the putsch as the Nazis had expected they would. The trial of the leaders in the uprising was conducted with dignity and the condemnation and execution of two of them—the man who actually killed Dollfuss and the chief of the raid—were taken as matters of course. Another Nazi, who killed a police captain of Innsbruck about the same time the chancellor was being murdered, also was found guilty and hanged.

Three thousand Nazis who took part in the outbreak in Carinthia escaped to Jugoslavia and were disarmed, and the Belgrade government now wonders what to do with them.

WITH monarchists in control of the Austrian government the royalists of that country and of Hungary resumed their schemes for putting the young Archduke Otto on the old throne of the Hapsburgs. There are reports that they held a secret meeting in Vitznau, Switzerland, and formed a restoration plan which they hoped would be acceptable to France, Italy, Great Britain and the little entente. Their first object was to secure the approval of Premier Mussolini. Leaders in the movement are Colonel Randa of the Austrian army, Felix Dunkel, an Austrian monarchist, and Count Hojos of Hungary.

According to the story current in Paris, the condition placed by the little entente and the big powers to allowing Otto to assume the throne is that he will sign a pledge guaranteeing the present boundaries and other terms of existing treaties with regard to Austria and the succession states.

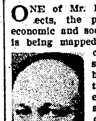
PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT returned to the mainland from his Hawaiian cruise. The Houston and the New Orleans moved up the Oregon coast, stopped briefly at Astoria and entered the Columbia river. The Presidential party debarked at Portland and almost immediately boarded a train which carried them rapidly eastward. Stops were made at the Bonneville project in Oregon and the Grand Coulee irrigation and power project in Washington. Mr. Roosevelt spent Sunday in Glacier national park and then continued his journey homeward.

IN ITS monthly survey of business the American Federation of Labor issued a warning that the enormous expenditures of the government for emergency needs and the artificial increase of buying power, if continued, will lead to currency inflation to meet the huge accumulating deficits.

It called attention to the steadily mounting tax burden, the extension of the relief rolls, the decline in business credit with the increase of government borrowing and the failure of NRA to put men to work in industry.

"The government cannot go on borrowing more than its income for very long," the statement said. "We can not go on increasing buying power in this way without a general expansion of production and consumption. Industry cannot pull itself up by its own boot straps."

ONE of Mr. Roosevelt's pet projects, the program for greater economic and social security, already is being mapped out by the special committee, including several cabinet members, that was named to get ready the necessary legislation for action by the next congress. Executive director of this committee, and therefore the most important member, is Prof. Edwin E. Witte, economist of the University of Wisconsin faculty. Professor Witte has been rather active in Wisconsin politics as a La Follette progressive and has advanced ideas along the lines on which he is now working.



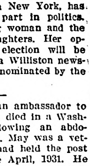
E. E. Witte

One of the main points of the program is the gradual decentralization of industry and this has been got under way already through the establishment of homestead projects in several localities. The purpose is to remove thousands of workers from tenement districts in large cities to areas where their standard of living could be raised. Officials believe that greater economic security will result through home ownership with small tracts of land.

There is now under consideration a related plan designed to offer to farmers who have suffered severely from the drouth a haven in Alaska. Jacob Baker, assistant chief of the federal emergency relief administration, has just completed a survey of a million acres of fertile land in the Mantanuska valley and has been discussing with Gov. John Troy the feasibility of taking 2,500 farm families up there as a federal colony.

SHARP criticism of the tender handling of deportable aliens by the Department of Labor has brought results, following the disclosure that when President Roosevelt recognized Russia no arrangements were made for the deportation of Russian Reds. To straighten out this situation Secretary Perkins has called back into service Walter W. Husband, a Vermont Republican who was assistant secretary of labor under Presidents Hoover and Coolidge. Only a month or two ago he was dropped to make room for Arthur Altmeyer of Wisconsin. Mr. Husband has been made a special assistant to Secretary Perkins and may be sent to Moscow.

WILLIAM LANGER, deposed as governor of North Dakota because of his conviction on federal charges of conspiring to solicit political contributions from federal relief workers, and who was renominated for governor by the Republicans, has withdrawn from the race. The Republican central committee promptly selected Mrs. Langer to head the ticket, and if she wins, the victory will be hailed as a vindication of her husband—just as Jim Ferguson of Texas once was "vindicated" by the election of his wife.



Mrs. William Langer

Mrs. Langer, a member of a family socially prominent in New York, has never before taken part in politics. She is a home-loving woman and the mother of four daughters. Her opponent in the fall election will be Thomas H. Moodie, a Williston newspaper man who was nominated by the Democrats.

PAUL MAY, Belgian ambassador to the United States, died in a Washington hospital following an abdominal operation. Mr. May was a veteran diplomat and had held the post in Washington since April, 1931. He was a man of engaging personality, MARTIAL law in Minneapolis, decreed by Gov. Floyd B. Olson because of rioting incidental to the strike of teamsters there, proved obnoxious to almost everybody and both the trucking firms and their 7,000 striking drivers asked for its dissolution. At the same time Adjutant General Walsh announced that the "insurrection" had been suppressed. Still the governor declined to withdraw the state troops. Additional trucks were given military permits to operate, and a ban against those in interstate commerce was revoked because its legality was in doubt. Beer trucks, however, were removed from the privileged list and were forbidden use of the streets on the ground that they did not furnish a necessary service.

Gov. F. B. Olson

At a mass meeting of union laborers the leaders demanded the withdrawal of the troops, the secretary of the truck drivers' union charging that the soldiers were "little more than strikebreakers."

Governor Olson's reply to this was to have the strikers' headquarters raided and their three leaders arrested. This naturally enraged the truck drivers and there was considerable violence.

Notwithstanding all this, the federal mediators, Father Haas and E. J. Dunnigan, were hopeful of bringing about a peaceful agreement in the near future.

Riots in Kohler Village, Wis., in which two men were killed, led Gov. A. G. Schemedeman to place the community under martial control, and 600 members of the National Guard were sent there. During the riot the police and deputies used tear gas bombs and blank cartridges and where these failed to disperse the mob, they opened fire with loaded shells. The officer commanding the Guardsmen ordered the disbanding of the force of special deputies and permitted the strikers to resume peaceful picketing of the Kohler plant.

Longshoremen of the Pacific coast ended their two-month long strike and returned to their jobs in all the ports, as did the marine workers. Pending arbitration by the federal board, stevedores will be employed by employer-controlled hiring halls under supervision of observers representing the board. Control of the hiring halls was the chief issue in the strike and is still to be settled by the arbitrators, along with the questions of increased wages, shorter working hours and improved conditions.

GEORGE N. PEEK, President Roosevelt's special adviser on foreign trade, announced that in an effort to recapture some of America's markets abroad the so-called Second Export-Import bank was ready to finance American shipments to any country in the world.

Hitherto this second bank has dealt only with Cuban trade, while the first bank was created to handle Russian business. Thus far the Russian bank has been moribund because Russia has failed to pay her war debts to this country.

Short term, intermediate, and long term credit will be offered to American shippers who need financing to push through deals abroad, Peek said. He defined short term credits as those of less than 180 days, intermediate credits as those maturing in 180 days to 12 months, and long term credits as those with maturities between one and five years.

SENATOR HUEY P. LONG and Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley of New Orleans were having another lively fight in the southern city. Governor Allen, one of Long's henchmen, mobilized 500 of the state troops and seized the registration office and its files, and the soldiers also were ordered to search out the city's red light district and gambling houses. The mayor increased his police forces to 1,400 and for a time there was prospect of "civil war."

Walmsley said the "moral crusade" was just a "smoke screen" to conceal the senator's real purpose of taking over the city government and influencing the primary election in September, in which both he and Long are supporting rival candidates.

JAPAN'S hopes for naval equality with Great Britain and the United States were dashed by a frank statement by Secretary of the Navy Swanson to the effect that, in his personal opinion, while the United States might favor a slash of 20 per cent in naval armaments, it would strongly oppose any realignment of existing naval ratios for the principal powers.

"I take the same position I always have," Secretary Swanson said. "The naval powers met in London and distributed naval strength as they thought just and right. Naval strength is relative. If we abandon the ratios there is no telling where we shall go."

"EXPLORER," the huge balloon constructed to carry three army officers far into the stratosphere, made a brave start from near Rapid City, S. D., rose to a height of 60,000 feet and then came to grief. Great rips appeared in the fabric of the bag and it came down rapidly and erratically, falling with its gondola 12 miles from Holdredge, Neb. Maj. W. E. Kepner, Capt. Orvil Anderson and Capt. Albert Stevens "balled out" and with the aid of their parachutes landed unhurt. But all their expensive and elaborate scientific equipment, with the exception of the spectograph, was destroyed when the gondola crashed. The spectograph had been hung outside and floated to earth on a separate small parachute.

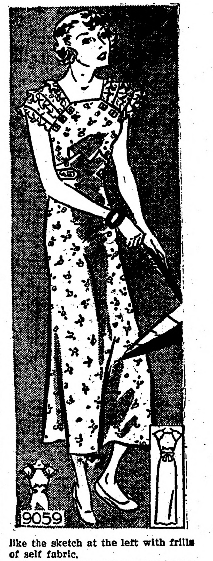
DESIGNED FOR VACATION DAYS

PATTERN 9059

Bother! Vacation around the corner and not enough frocks! Never mind, here is an easy way out. Select three fabrics you like in your most becoming colors. A pretty print, an ecru organdie, and a china blue crepe de chine—would that be good for you? But first, of course, order the pattern! Make the organdie with frills of ecru lace on the shoulders and use a brown ribbon for your belt. Wouldn't he like you in that of an evening? The print could be quite plain and the crepe de chine like the sketch at the left with frills of self fabric.



Pattern 9059 may be ordered only in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42. Size 16 requires 3¼ yards 36-inch fabric.

Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER AND SIZE.

Send your order to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 232 West Eighteenth Street, New York, N. Y.

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer, young professor of English literature and rhetoric, meets on the train a young man, Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy, as professor of mathematics and chemistry. They reach the railroad station, and meet Mrs. Denver, engaged as matron of the Academy. At the school the group is struck by an air of mystery pervading the lonely place. Gordon Haskell, the proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne, teacher of psychology, completes the faculty.

"How good it looks," Mrs. Denver said frankly. "This mountain air makes one hungry."

"Are we to wait for Mr.—Haskell?"

"I think we ought to," Mrs. Denver said.

The servitor turned at the door on hearing these words. "Don't wait for him! Don't look for him until you see him."

The quartette laughed a little nervously, and drew up their chairs. Mrs. Denver, at Janet's request, poured the tea, and they all drank it with the slight constraint of people only just beginning to know each other.

"I love the region," Payne remarked. "I think homesickness drew me to this spot; how intensely quiet it is!"

"Intensely quiet. I wonder where the scholars are."

"Of course, they may all be in the class rooms," Arthur ventured. "Or else out at hare-and-hounds—or in the gymnasium."

Mrs. Denver was carefully putting some dropped crumbs on the edge of the tray. "I want to get right into work—see where the linen closets are, and the mending room, and know what servants will be directly under my supervision—there's so much detail in a house as big as this; and I am eager to know his rules and requirements."

"I hope there's a good library," Janet remarked.

"I am going into the hall for a minute," Arthur said, rising, "to look again at those old portraits." He returned in a little while with an air of relief. "Well, I glanced through a glass door and discovered a handful of the scholars bending over their desks; but of all absorbed students, and in such fading light, too! Not one stirred or looked up while I was standing there. Then I examined those great maps in the rear hall. They are dated back in the fifties—queer to keep obsolete maps in a modern academy! The desks were very clumsy looking, too—an ancient type. I should think parents would make a row about such archaic furnishings. I hope the school books are more modern than the maps."

"Queer that one hears no bells," said Mrs. Denver. "I'd feel sort of at home if I heard a bell."

What they did hear was a long, low laugh—like the laughter of a very sophisticated, crafty, but not very friendly person. It was repeated after a moment's interval, then seemed to die away on the staircase. Twilight was setting in, but no one came to light the lamps. At last Haskell appeared, smiling, bending down his handsome, sensitive face to smell his gardenia.

The four rose with alacrity, and he led them down the hall past the glass door. The newcomers glanced through it.

"There are some real students!" Janet remarked. "How intensely absorbed they seem."

Haskell at the head of the little procession turned sharply around, glanced through the door, and for an instant his face became deathly white. But he recovered himself almost at once. "Ah, the lights should be on there. This way, my pedagogues. I ask your admiration of the curve of this staircase; is it not beautiful?"

He went on before them with a light, almost jaunty step. Mrs. Denver sniffed the air suspiciously, thinking she smelled must. "This place needs a thorough overhauling," she thought. "How glad I'll be to get started—to settle down—to know just what I have to do."

"This is your room," Haskell said to Janet, throwing open a door with the number 90 on it. "And yours is just next," addressing Mrs. Denver. "You will find matches on the table. Unfortunately we have to use lamps here. The bathroom is just opposite. Now, Wilton, Fleming."

His voice had suddenly become both harsh and secretive. The two men followed him down the corridor, disappeared around a corner.

Janet put a hand on Mrs. Denver's arm. "I am so glad to be next door to you. It's all so strange."

"You feel strange here, too?"

"Very strange."

"He must be rather stern or those young people wouldn't sit so still."

"They seemed almost like dead people," Janet remarked. "Let us light the lamp."

"I wish there weren't so many pines—it's a gloomy tree," Mrs. Denver commented.

"We'll feel better when we've been introduced to the other teachers and know our duties."

"Are there other teachers?"

Their blank faces confronted each other. "It would be a very small faculty—three people," Janet ventured in a weak voice.

"My dear, you look pale. Sit down a minute. Let's keep quite still and listen—maybe those children, who were straining their eyes, will be rushing out soon."

Janet sat down nervously, telling herself she was very foolish. But she kept silence, her eyes on the bit of black braiding on Mrs. Denver's gown. She thought of Wilton Payne, and was glad Arthur Fleming had a man to companion him as she had a woman. They sat very still. Outside, the wind moaned in the pine trees, and there was a splash of rain against the window. Within the house profound silence reigned.

A heavy knock on the door made them both start. But it was only the man with their baggage. He entered and departed silently.

"Really I don't want to unpack my trunk," Janet remarked. "I wonder if there is hot water in the bathroom?"

She found the bathroom as antiquated as the rest of the house, with a built-in copper tub—a basin highly ornamented with colored flowers and gold scroll-work, with big clumsy taps. But there was hot water.

Curiosity was getting the better of fatigue and fear. She went to the head of the staircase. As she stood there a hand was laid on her shoulder. She started violently, turned and saw Haskell's bright, restless eyes fixed upon her.

As She Stood There a Hand Was Laid on Her Shoulder.

"Don't go down, Miss Mercer," he commanded.

"The quiet of the house oppresses me."

"I fear you are over-excited, overtired. Go back to your room and rest."

Only too glad to get away from him, she returned to her bedroom. At the door stood Mrs. Denver, who by way of dressing for dinner had assumed a neat lace collar.

"Have you heard anything yet?"

"Not a thing. I was starting to go downstairs when Mr. Haskell met me—and—really—commanded be to go back to my room."

"I've only unpacked a few things—I feel so strange here. I've not even heard a bell, and you always hear bells in schools."

"I suppose he will be sending for us—soon—unless—"

Mrs. Denver's eyes were fixed on hers with apprehension. "Unless what?" she whispered.

"Unless he doesn't want those very quiet students to be disturbed."

"Poor children! I wonder if Mr. Payne's and Mr. Fleming's rooms are near us? Somehow I'd feel safer if they were in call."

"Why, we act as if this wasn't a big house full of people. Listen, the wind is rising again. There must be heavy draughts. See the lamp flicker!"

Another knock on the door. This time it was the stolid maidservant.

"Dinner's ready," she announced.

Janet put out her lamp. Instead of turning toward the stairs, the young woman led them down the corridor; ahead of them they saw an oblong of light cutting the dark hall from an open door.

Arthur and Wilton Payne were standing just inside this door, looking with an air of bewilderment at a table set for four which occupied the center of what seemed to be an upstairs sitting room.

"Sit down and I'll bring the soup," the servant said.

They looked at each other, then silently took their places. When Arthur was sure that the waitress was out of hearing, he leaned across the table and spoke to Janet.

"Mr. Payne and I haven't seen one scholar yet—barring those in the classroom."

Their dinner was excellent—plain food, but well cooked. At the salad course, Haskell suddenly appeared in the doorway.

"Everything right?" he asked cheerfully. "I believe that a good table in a school is more than half the education."

"Where is the general dining room?" Mrs. Denver inquired boldly.

"Downstairs in the west wing."

"Your pupils are certainly well trained," Arthur remarked. "Are you always so intensely quiet here?"

Haskell twisted a seal ring on his finger. "Mr. Payne, what are the psychological bases of fear?"

Up-to-Date Ideas for Decorating Rough Wall

In the summertime persons who delight in having living quarters totally different from those occupied during the winter, often prefer to have their cottages unplastered. And there are other families who find the cost of the plain board walls so much less than plastered, that for economical reasons the walls are left in this unfinished state. But in neither instance does it mean that the walls are left bare. It simply signifies that the treatment is in accord with the scheme of the interior finish.

The spaces between beams offer excellent opportunities for wall hangings of a crude type. There are fascinating Mexican fiber and grass pieces of charming crudeness, yet with genuine artistic feeling which are well suited to some homes of the kind described. Also there are hangings of homespun linen, heavy, and coarse, on which designs are done in coarse cotton, and braid and tape are also introduced for latticed flower pots, baskets, etc., from which the broadly worked stalks, foliage, and flowers are growing or standing out gaily. Burlap in natural color could be used for the foundation, should the home decorator decide to make such a wall hanging.

Play bills, and travel posters are often sufficiently artistic to be attractive decoration for unplastered beamed walls. These travel posters may be from a collection made during trips abroad or across the country, or they may be from some tourists' agency. For seashore cottages, posters of huge ocean liners plowing their way through the waves are appropriate and, with the bright colors in which they are portrayed, they make brilliant spots of color on dull wood walls.

Persons who have a fondness for the theater can sometimes get hold of theatrical posters, or play bills, as they are termed. Some of these are artistic, some are merely striking, but all give a flavor of the stage to the simple shack.

Shelves fitted in between the upright beams of an unfinished wall supply places for books and ornaments. If these latter are well chosen to suit the cottage idea they give a cozy look, while books always are inviting and welcoming. Old china and pottery have a peculiar charm for these interiors, which should be kept simple but which should also be livened up by the wall schemes.

MRS. WILLIAMS GAINS RELIEF FROM "RHEUMATIC" PAINS

Dr. W. E. Fitch Explains why Natural Mineral Water Often Helpful In Chronic Ailments

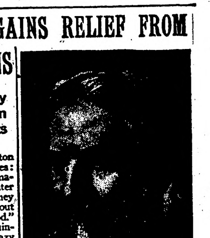
Mrs. H. Williams, 16 Princeton Street, Clifton, New Jersey, writes: "I suffered very badly with rheumatism but after taking Crazy Water Crystals I am a different person. They are wonderful. I would not be without them, they did me so much good."

Why is it that a fine natural mineral water, made at home from Crazy Water Crystals has benefited so many thousands suffering from "rheumatic" pains and other chronic ailments?

Dr. W. E. Fitch, noted medical authority on mineral water, in a recent radio talk over the National Broadcasting System stated:

"For many years, it has been a mystery even to the medical world just how natural mineral waters produced the amazing results that have made them so popular. Scientific and medical discoveries and research in the last few years, however, are penetrating these secrets of Nature, so that now medical men have a new understanding of the reasons for the power of natural mineral water to relieve suffering. One of these reasons is what is known as secondary mineralization, by which is meant that not only the predominating chemical constituents of a mineral water are of aid but also what are known as the secondary minerals—those present in infinitesimal quantities. The very fact of their being present in this way causes them to have a much more powerful systemic effect than if they were there in larger quantities. Let me recommend wholeheartedly to sufferers from chronic diseases the use of a suitable natural mineral water as a powerful adjuvant."

If you are suffering from "rheumatic" pains, we suggest you investigate Crazy Water Crystals immediately. Ask any of the millions who have used them.



William Edward Fitch, M. D.

Crazy Water Crystals are just minerals crystallized from a great natural mineral water flowing at Mineral Wells, Texas, and Thorndale, Texas, a type of mineral water that has built one of the world's greatest health resorts. Nothing is added to the minerals, and by dissolving them in plain water you make a fine mineral water at home at a cost of only a few cents a gallon.

A standard sized package, sufficient for three weeks mineral water treatment in your own home costs only $1.50. Get one today. Crazy Water Co., Mineral Wells, Texas.

SPECIAL EXHIBITS FOR STATE FAIR

Greatest Educational Program In 75 Years to be Presented This Year.

Three-quarters of a century of agricultural and industrial progress will be featured in the thousands of educational exhibits at the Minnesota State Fair Diamond Jubilee celebration, September 1 to 8.

The great 1934 Expositon marks the 75th anniversary of its founding. Since the first exhibition was held at Fort Snelling, displaying the primary tenets of pioneer farming to the wonderment of the populace, the Fair has marked the milestones on the march of agriculture.

Only a few head of livestock and meager exhibits of simple grains and grasses were displayed at the first Fair. This year more than 7,000 individual exhibitors will give a complete cross-section of up-to-the-minute agricultural methods as they are applied to Minnesota conditions.

Admission Again 25 Cents

With the vast expansion of the Fair the admission price remains the same, 25 cents, thus affording every citizen the opportunity of visiting one of State's leading educational institutions.

Premiums totalling nearly $75,000 are being offered as awards of merit in the various departments.

Livestock always has been the keystone of the exhibits and this year 6,000 head of cattle, horses, swine and sheep, the blue-bloods of the nation, will give visual demonstration of the results of long years of scientific and successful breeding.

Thirteen hundred boys and girls, the pick of the thousands active in 4-H Club work, will illustrate the far-reaching results of this laudable program. New projects will be introduced along with those that have been the foundation of the 4-H program for many years. Hundreds of demonstrations will be given daily ranging from canning, sewing and room furnishing to livestock breeding and feeding projects.

Record Displays Expected

In the Agricultural building, record county booth displays arranged in symmetrical beauty, will give visual evidence of the true diversity of farm crops. Hundreds of varieties of grains and grasses, which at early Fairs were thought impossible to grow in this rigorous climate, will be on display as a tribute to the hardy pioneers who developed them.

The Horticultural exhibits will show a score of new strains and varieties of fruits and flowers, exhibited for the first time, illustrative of Minnesota's increasing importance in orchard and garden.

Machinery displays will differ radically from those of the first Fair. In three-quarters of a century, the flail and sickle have become outmoded and have been replaced by power machinery that has revolutionized agriculture.

This year, by way of contrast to old methods and antiquated equipment, there will be a complete display of modern farm machinery covering more than 60 acres showing the epochal strides that have been made toward a more profitable agriculture.

The host of educational exhibits are designed to be of interest to every member of the family. Handicraft, needlework and cookery displays, 5,000 of them, will be featured in the Woman's activities building. There will be a $1,000,000 art show, a display of prime meat cuts, choice butter and cheese, succulent honey and the bees that produce it, home appliances, electrical equipment, an exhibit developed by the school children of the state, and thousands of others.

These exhibits, covering every imaginable field, are what make the Minnesota State Fair the outstanding educational institution for the masses.

Gay Nineties Period Featured In State Fair Night Spectacle

Featured in the "Gay Nineties" episode of the Diamond Jubilee Night Show at the Minnesota State Fair, September 1 to 8, will be the famed Crazy Carpenters, hilarious comedians. Their idiotic antics make these artists of pantomime the most famous comedy troupe in the world.

20 Years Ago

From the Holt Weekly News for August 21, 1914

20 years ago we see a headline—"Mud Lake Bottom To Be Opened?" It was. Appropriately enough, in 1934 we could set another headline—"Mud Lake Bottom To Be Closed?" It is.

The Holt Merc. Co. had a cement basement built; and new sections of cement sidewalk were being built on the south side of main street.

The two section crews, under foremen John Folstad and Chas. Hagglund, were burning grass and plowing the right-of-way.

People were wondering why the war should raise the price of foodstuffs. Pres. Wilson appointed a commission to look into this. But War Profiteering hadn't really started.

Homestead lands in Oregon were being advertised.

Among those who went to N. D. to thresh were Ernest Silbaugh, Thorval Kolden, Elmer Hagglund, and Willie and Arnold Hoel.

Racine Olson was running a threshing rig near Warren.

The two dray lines had to hire extra help to take care of the freight shipments received for the stores and the new settlers.

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

H.O. Hanson, Editor and Publisher Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota, Friday, August 24, 1934. Volume 24, Number 17

Views and Reviews

[The views below do not necessarily coincide with the official beliefs of this publication; they are merely personal observations.]

On Tuesday, August 28, a peculiar thing will come to pass: Upton Sinclair, perennial Socialist candidate for governor of California, goes into that state's primarics on the Democratic ticket with a platform that is "much more radicler" than the platforms he used when running as a Socialist.

Dopesters say that Sinclair stands a good show of winning the nomination. More than that, they say he will loom large in the Fall election. Sinclair promises to "End Poverty In California" by his EPIC Plan. The word "Epic" is derived from the initials of his slogan.

Briefly, his plan is to organize the poor and the unemployed into groups and take over, by the constitutional power of Eminent Domain, such factories and concerns that have not been operating, or whose owners desire to work in with the plan. These concerns will produce things at cost.

Sinclair has a huge advantage over his opponents in that he actually has something to offer the people. Nor does he underestimate the deadliness of those who fight against him. The money-men, of course, would find California hard sledding if Sinclair should become governor. Nor do they underestimate the threat of Upton Sinclair.

In 1904 Sinclair wrote "The Jungle," a novel of the Chicago stockyards; and as a direct result, a congressional investigation of the yards followed, and several practices stopped. Again in 1916, "King Coal" caused an upheaval in the Colorado coal fields, with better working conditions resulting. And these are but two out of an armful of books that Upton Sinclair has written. All of them pack a wallop. All have been translated into foreign languages. The total circulation of his works runs into the hundreds of millions.

Whatever the result, the world will enjoy a treat when Upton Sinclair swings into action. He has been at the helm in several "crusades," and this one promfses to be the biggest of all. Sinclair quite sensibly argues that if and when poverty is ended in California, the next task will be to spread a like condition over the entire country. —B.C.H.

Advice of Inspectors

Quality is a very important factor in the production of cream, with inspectors inspecting all butter that comes on the market, for foreign matter such as flies and other things that may get into the cream, which may result in a total loss of some churnings. Let's all work hand in hand to prevent such happenings.

Five Weeks on Wheels

High Lights of An Auto Tour to the West Coast

by Hans O. Hanson

II. Up the Yellowstone to the Park

We are now at the eastern Montana state line. We crossed it west of Beach, N. Dak., and enter the great state of Montana, the eastern part of which is very rolling and cut up. After a two hour drive we came into Glendive, a nice thriving city on the banks of the Yellowstone river. Following the valley of this river, we headed southwest, spending a night at Terry. All the crops were dried out in this beautiful valley and practically all the large herds of cattle had been bought up by the Government and shipped out.

We passed thru Miles City and saw some very fine crops of alfalfa, sugar beets and truck gardens on the irrigated lands around there. From there we struck out along the river to Billings where we camped overnight. It was real hot and one did not care to go too far each day without a stopover. Talked to some farmers there from up near the Glacier Park country in the northern part of the state who, reported that there was a stretch up in there where they were getting a big wheat crop. We had intended to go out on the road thru that park but, it had too many miles of detours due to new road construction.

From Billings we hopped to Livingston, a very nice town in the very foothills of the Rockies. We spent a few hours there before starting south along the beautiful gorge of the Yellowstone river which we followed for fifty miles to Gardiner, the gate city to the park from the north. We registered in at the park gate where the government keeps a ranger station and park officials.

The cost of entering the park was $3 per car regardless of how many rode in it. This fee entitled all members of the party to fish in all the streams and lakes there and, when they said fishing, that was what they had. The trout played around boulders in all the small brooks and lakes that are very numerous in the gorgeous mountains of this park. Take your rod and reel along when you go there.

After a 26 mile jaunt into the park we came to one of the ranger stations where we put up the first night. There the Park Service furnished free wood, water and tables as well as a beautiful camp ground for your tent. We were now in the Norris Geyser Basin and there were hundreds of wonderful sights to see. We could hardly believe that so many beautiful things were actually so close to home.

We at last came to Old Faithful and joined a crowd of about a thousand people in watching this geyser spout or play as they called it out there. We saw it work twice. It boils for an hour until the steam presure gets so great that it has to shoot out all the water that is in it. It repeats this wonderful work once every hour without fail. The stream of water is shot 150 feet into the air and, this stream will remain that way for six minutes at each play. Thousands of gallons of hot water rush over the terrace of this geyser when it spouts. It has not failed or changed in sixty years.

From there we went to the great Yellowstone Lake where the Yellowstone river begins its way thru a most picturesque canyon. This canyon is one of the most gorgeously nature painted scenes we saw on our whole trip. Two high waterfalls are in this beautiful canyon. The lake, hung high in the mountains near the continental divide, which we crossed twice before coming to it, was a large colored body of water, full of fish and beautiful beaches.

One of the most peculiar sights was the Dragon's Mouth, a large hole in the side of a big cliff, which barked regularly with three distinct "Woofs!" At each "woof" it spouted forth several barrels of hot water, which fell into a rock basin, and ran back into the mouth. At the third bark, the climax came, and then the process was repeated. When Lewis and Clark traveled thru there, they heard this weird sound from the Yellowstone river, a half a mile from the Dragon's mouth. Since that time, the sound has lost a third of its volume; but it still is enough to scare one. Geologists believe that the sound is caused by running water in an immense underground cave.

Another great feature that we saw, was an open air bear show. Several hundred tourists were taken out two miles from camp to a natural amphitheatre and seated on a grandstand made out of logs and fenced in with high netting. Below this was a concrete platform upon which was heaped all kinds of good eats for the bears. At 6:45 in the evening, the regular feeding time, we saw 53 grown up Grizzly and Silvertip bears come to feed. There were also 17 cubs besides the large ones.

A park ranger gave a half hour lecture on the life and habits of the bears and, also told us all about all the other wild animals. It was a rare sight to see all these large bears come in from the hillsides around us and feed and fight on the platform. When the project was first begun a few years ago, only black and brown bears came to eat. Now they were fed at a different place as the grizzlies took over the big show.

We saw many Buffalo, Moose, Elk, Deer, one Big Horn Mountain sheep and several eagles. There are thousands of wild animals in the park. We also saw the natural "Monad" that the Northern Pacific Railway is using for its trademak.

Gas and groceries are sold at regular prices at all resorts in the park. All roads are marked well, oiled and policed.

We are now leaving the park and have just come thru the petrified trees and are taking another look at the Mammoth Hot Spring and its most beautifully colored terraces. We drove 200 miles in a horseshoe loop in this natural garden of beauty and wonderful sights.

I could go on and on telling you about the wonders and the bears, which sometimes walked right around our camp fire.

We're out thru the gate and headed back to Livingston. It was worth more than $3 each to see all this. See u next week.

The Reason Why

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

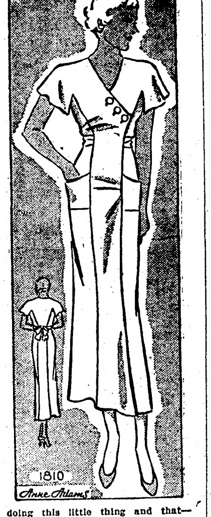
REAL COMFORT IN COAT DRESS

PATTERN 1810

Since it is perfectly obvious from the sketch how smart this house frock is, we are going to begin by calling your attention to how nice it is to slip into a coat dress the first thing in the morning or when one comes in from outdoors and wishes to get into "working clothes" as quickly as possible. One throws it around her—ties the sash—and that is that, so far as putting it on is concerned. But the enjoying of it has just begun. It is such a satisfaction to know that one is looking pretty and well dressed as one goes about doing this little thing and that—everything seems easier!



Pattern 1810 is available in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 16 takes 4½ yards 36-inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address orders to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 243 West Seventeenth street, New York City.

UNSEEN SPIRIT

"Didn't you put up the money for that big musical show?"

"Yes," answered Mr. Dustin Stax.

"But your name isn't mentioned on the program."

"Of course not. I'm the ghost underwriter."

Will of the People

"Do you think we will ever have another war?" inquired the anxious constituent.

"Never," answered Senator Sorghum, "if we honestly respect the will of the people. There isn't a man in the world who would deliberately cast his ballot in favor of war."

Awful Prospect

Mabel (studying geography)—Oh, nurse, I'm so glad Mummy's only got us three children.

Nurse—Why, dear?

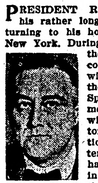
President Roosevelt's Vacation Trip Ends—NRA Modification and Drouth Relief Taken Up—Von Papen's Hard Task in Austria.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT ended his rather long vacation trip, returning to his home in Hyde Park, New York. During the remainder of the summer and until congress meets he will spend some time there and in Warm Springs, Georgia, but most of the time he will be in Washington, busy with the nation's affairs in his temporary office which has been established in the blue room of the White House. The executive offices are being remodeled and enlarged. One of the first matters to claim the President's attention is the modification of NRA. The secret cabinet committee he appointed to inquire into the legality and advisability of continuing and extending the price fixing features of NRA has decided this price fixing should be restricted and gradually abandoned, and there is little doubt that this advice will be followed. Whether or not the fixing of prices is legal, it has brought sharp and continuous criticism from Senator Borah and many others which has not been relished by the New Dealers.



President Roosevelt

On his way from the west coast the President not only saw some of the great public works projects of the Northwest, but also passed through regions that have suffered severely from the drouth. So he is backing up the government agencies in their work of hurrying vast sums of government money to the arid regions to ease the human suffering and also to lessen the chances of another such catastrophe. The public works administration, which had an original appropriation of $3,300,000,000, revealed it had spent about $400,000,000 on projects to aid impoverished western families.

Emergency relief administration officials announced they had allotted huge sums to feed men and women. They also have spent thousands to care for starving cattle.

Public Works Administrator Harold L. Ickes, who was on an inspection tour in the drouth area, ordered his forces to expedite all construction projects affecting the dry regions.

NATIONALIZATION of silver, authorized by the last congress, was ordered into effect by the President. This will have little immediate effect on the average citizen, though the move is somewhat inflationary and started prices on the up-grade. Big debtors and owners of silver mines will benefit, but as the value of the dollar goes down, the holders of securities and loans suffer loss.

The President's order directs the surrender to the government of all silver bullion and bars within 90 days, the price to be paid being 50.01 cents an ounce. Silver coins and silverware are not included. Under the silver purchase act the treasury is authorized to value the silver it obtains at $1.29 an ounce and to issue silver certificates on that basis. The government proposes to hold enough silver to make up 25 per cent of the metal backing of the national currency. No one knows how much silver bullion there is in the United States, and it may be necessary to make considerable purchases in China and India.

SECRETARY OF STATE HULL and Secretary of Agriculture Wallace joined in a statement concerning their efforts to revive America's world trade, explaining that the reciprocal trade agreements to be negotiated with foreign countries will be beneficial and not harmful to American agriculture and manufacturing.

The statement pointed out, in answer to criticism from farm organizations, that farm interests would not be sacrificed to aid other groups.

It also said no sacrifice of any major or basic agricultural or manufacturing industry was planned, although Secretary Wallace told reporters that some harm might be done to a tiny fraction of the producers for the greater good of all.

ONE thousand men and women comprising the Minneapolis Protective committee telegraphed an appeal to President Roosevelt to protect the constitutional rights now superseded by martial law in their city. Copies of the appeal were sent also to Secretary Perkins and Lloyd Garrison, chairman of the National Labor Relations board.

"We are satisfied," they wired, "that an agreement between employers and employees could be reached were it not for the interference by a small body of citizens known to be Communist agitators who are being supported in their agitations by the sympathetic attitude of Gov. Floyd B. Olson."

At the end of the statement was a sentence interpreted as a request for replacement of the federal mediators, Father Francis J. Haas and E. H. Dunnigan.

The conciliators were authors of a peace plan which the union accepted with alacrity because it granted a maximum of the demands made before the walkout. It was turned down by the employers, but mediation proceeded until the principal point of difference now concerns the rehiring of all the strikers. The Haas-Dunnigan plan makes that blanket provision. The employers do not wish to be forced to take back men who have Communistic sympathies.

"The federal conciliators now here are unable to effect a settlement," the protective committee told Mr. Roosevelt. "Labor is being deprived of its earning power; business institutions are suffering substantial losses; taxpayers are being subjected to further burden (through maintenance of the National Guard) and our city and surrounding territory are demanding the right to conduct lawfully ordinary business and industrial affairs.

"We appeal to you to take immediate steps to remedy the situation and send us conciliators who will recognize the needs of all citizens and prevent demonstration of the situation for political purposes."

Gen. Hugh Johnson's efforts to end the strike of live stock handlers at the Union stockyards in Chicago were successful. The strike was called off and Federal Judge Sullivan resumed his work as mediator to construe the award he made on May 31 as arbitrator of a similar strike that took place last November.

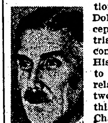
IN GREEN BAY, WIS., the President delivered what was considered his principal political address of the year. He told his hearers that the New Deal was going ahead on its nonpartisan road and that those who support it "do so because it is a square deal and because it is essential to the preservation of security and happiness of a free society."

The President's reference to Wisconsin political alignments was this significant remark:

"Your two senators, both old friends of mine, and many others have worked with me in maintaining excellent co-operation betwen the executive and legislative branches of the government."

Senator Robert M. LaFollette, Republican independent and sponsor of the new state political party, is up for re-election. F. Ryan Duffy, Democrat, is the other senator from Wisconsin, elected in 1932.

FRANZ VON PAPEN, vice chancellor of Germany, who was appointed minister to Austria during the excitement that followed the assassination of Chancellor Dollfuss, has been accepted by the Austrian cabinet after considerable delay. His avowed task is to restore amicable relations between the two governments, but this will not be easy, Chancellor Schuschnigg is as determined to root out Nazism in Austria as was his predecessor, and at the same time the German Nazis are keeping up their press and radio attacks on the Austrian government. In camps around Munich are about 40,000 Austrian Nazi fugitives for whom Von Papen is expected to obtain amnesty so they may return to their country; but as they have been hoping to march into Austria under arms to overthrow the government, it isn't likely Schuschnigg will care to let them return.



Franz Von Papen

The cabinet in Vienna is taking vigorous action to curb the Nazis, and it was reported that the executive of that party had been ordered dissolved, the members being told to take leaves of absence and to cease activities.

Chancellor Hitler is daily solidifying his power in Germany. The latest step is to require all Protestant pastors and church officials to take an oath of fealty to Hitler just as did the Nazi storm troops and members of the regular army. New rules were imposed by the national synod that make Reichsbishop Mueller the supreme lawmaker and authority for the church.

Between eight and ten thousand political prisoners in concentration camps were given their liberty by an amnesty decree announced by Hitler in memory of President Von Hindenburg.

ARABS of Algeria, like the Arabs of Palestine, do not love their Jewish neighbors, so they started anti-Semitic riots in Constantine and surrounding towns in the course of which a great many persons were killed or wounded. Nearly all the casualties were among the Jews. The French military authorities quickly got control of the situation. Constantine is in a wheat growing area and the Arab farmers had a poor crop this year. The rioting gave them a chance to wipe out many debts to Jewish bankers and shopkeepers.

SHIPPING and business interests long have urged the establishment of "free ports" or foreign trade zones at many American sea, lake and river ports, and this is now under consideration by the government, having been authorized by the last congress. Trade and shipping experts are preparing information on how to apply for grants.

Some of the cities that have asked how to set up the trade zones are New York, Newark, N. J., Providence, R. I.; Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, San Diego, Calif., Miami, Fla., and Hoboken, N. J. Private corporations located on the Great Lakes also are interested.

A barrier would surround the area set off for the trade zone. Into this area, which must be equipped with adequate shipping and warehousing facilities, foreign and domestic merchandise could be brought, without being subject to customs laws, and stored, broken up, repacked, assembled, distributed, sorted, mixed with other foreign and domestic goods, and then exported. Or, if desired, the merchandise could be placed in American domestic commerce upon payment of customs duties.

FROM now on Communists are not going to have so pleasant a time in the United States, and the spreading of their destructive doctrine will not be so easy. Congressional investigations into this matter may not have amounted to a great deal, but several of the country's great organizations have undertaken to arouse the people to the danger that threatens their government and their national institutions. The Order of Elks took cognizance of the Communist threat in its convention in Kansas City, and Michael F. Shannon, its newly elected grand exalted ruler, is now making an airplane tour of the country for the purpose of urging every lodge of the order to carry on the "Pro-America" program in its community. He will travel 10,000 miles to give what he calls "marching orders" to the 1,400 Elk lodges. Of the Communists in America, Mr. Shannon says:

M. F. Shannon

"A vast and formidable organization has been set up. The United States is now divided into twenty districts, each with its own committee. Each district is divided into two sections and subsections, with section committees set up in accordance with the residential locations of the Communist members.

"Youth organizations, formed to teach not only disrespect, but hate, for American institutions, have appeared everywhere. Organizations under patriotic names, but designed to destroy confidence in our government, are meeting nightly. Bureaus of propaganda are working secretly."

The Crusaders, that organization of young business men that was so influential in bringing about repeal of prohibition, has been reorganized and, under the leadership of Fred G. Clark, commander in chief, has entered the fight against the Communists and other groups that seek to overthrow American institutions. Among its national advisers are Aldrich Blake, Oklahoma City; Francis H. Brownell, New York; John W. Davis, New York; Prof. E. W. Kemmerer, Princeton, N. J.; Martin W. Littleton, New York; Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., New York; Charles F. Thwing, Cleveland; James P. Warburg, New York, and Sewell L. Avery and Albert D. Lasker, Chicago.

The Paul Reveres, a national organization, was established especially to cleanse educational and religious institutions of subversive influences; and the American Vigilante Intelligence federation is also actively combating Communism. The Department of Americanization of the American Legion is working in the same cause.

A congressional subcommittee, of which Representative Charles Kramer is chairman, has been investigating Communist activities in southern California, and also has heard a lot of testimony about the so-called Silver Shirts, an organization with alleged Nazi affiliations and a large membership. An intelligence service witness who joined the Silver Shirts, said members were armed and that he was offered money for stolen government machine guns, rifles and ammunition. He said the declared objective of the organization was to take charge of the United States government, by force if necessary.

WHETHER or not Japan obtains naval parity with Great Britain and the United States, it proposes to have a powerful navy. Admiral Mineo Osumi, minister of the navy, submitted to the cabinet the largest naval budget in the country's history. It calls for appropriation of about $214,416,000 for the coming year. New items alone total about $90,000,000. In the last budget the diet allowed the navy little more than half of what is now asked.

France has denied Japan her support in any steps toward abrogation of the Washington navy treaty of 1921 by announcing her intention to adhere to its provisions pending "some change in the European situation."

HEARTY approval was given by the world Baptist congress, in session in Berlin, to a proposal that a plebiscite be held in 40 countries to determine whether the people want to fight another war. The suggestion was made by Rev. Harold Camp of Oakland, Calif., who said the Kellogg pact should be made the basis of such a vote.

St. James—Corn-hog contracts signatures of the county will average 98 per cent of all farmers, according to J. L. Swedberg, county agent, in charge of the activity.

Ivanhoe—The lowest tax budget for Lincoln county in 20 years, $8,000 under last year's levy, was set by the county board here. The budget sets $93,700 for 1935 expenditures.

St. Paul—Minnesota had 236 licensed pilots and 242 licensed and unlicensed aircraft on July 1, it was disclosed in figures released by the U. S. bureau of air commerce.

Duluth—William R. Mitchell, Tracy, was elected commander of the Minnesota department of the American Legion at the annual convention here. He succeeds M. F. Murray, St. Cloud.

Rochester—President Franklin D. Roosevelt headed the list of notables at a ceremony here honoring the Mayo brothers. A crowd of approximately 150,000 persons attended the event.

St. Paul—CCC camps in Minnesota will be increased from 48 to 61 under the federal emergency conservation work program, according to E. V. Willard, state commissioner of conservation.

Sauk Center—Two new buildings are under construction and a new front is being erected on the IOOF building. Several business places are undergoing repairs and remodeling on the main street.

Pipestone—The county commissioners have made up the tax levy for 1935, and it totals $99,150. That is $5,000 higher than the levy for this year, but contains one entirely new item of $10,000 for old age pensions.

Minneapolis—A new kind of park vandalism was disclosed here. Thieves apparently armed with crowbars and other instruments of high leverage have been prying bronze memorial markers from the boulders to which they have been riveted.

Minneapolis—Merchants from five northwest states poured into Minneapolis and St. Paul for the semi-annual Twin City Market week. Minnesota, Wisconsin, North Dakota, South Dakota and Montana were all represented in the registrations.

Osseo—A broken journal on a freight car wrecked 10 cars of a Great Northern freight train, piling up cars, tearing up nearly 400 feet of rails and forcing other trains to be rerouted by way of Anoka, Elk River and St. Cloud until a wrecking crew could clear the jam.

Minneapolis—A six-week open season on migratory waterfowl was suggested by Minnesota representatives at a two-day conservation conference conducted at Dubuque and Sioux City, Iowa, in an endeavor to establish uniform open seasons in the northern central states. Approval of the suggestion rests with the federal secretary of agriculture upon recommendation of the United States bureau of biological survey.

Warren — Acquisition of 100,000 acres in the Mud lake area, to be used for the establishment of a refuge for wild fowl, is well under way, it was reported by sponsors of the project. Establishment of this preserve, located in eastern Marshall county, is considered highly important because of its proximity to the Red Lake wild life refuge and to Thief lake, which recently was restored by the state division of game and fish.

Sanborn—Plans for the annual watermelon day on August 23 are in progress. Ted Hensch has been named chairman of the general committee on arrangements. Five bands will furnish the music and prominent citizens will give short talks.

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer, young professor of English literature and rhetoric, meets on the train a young man, Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy, as professor of mathematics and chemistry. They reach the railroad station, they meet Mrs. Denver, engaged as matron of the Academy. At the school the group is struck by an air of mystery pervading the lonely place. Gordon Haskell, the proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne, teacher of psychology, completes the faculty.

"Danger—mystery—the unknown; the untried."

"Precisely. What are the manifestations of fear? Intense silence or wild raucous sound? Oh, I am jesting, of course—but I do prefer deep silence to shrill noises. Miss Mercer, will you have French or Russian dressing on your salad?"

"May we see the establishment after dinner, sir?"

"Well, really, I'd much prefer your pupils should think of you as far-off Olympians."

"At ease on Parnassus' slopes," Payne remarked with a lifting of his eyebrows.

Haskell had drawn up a chair next to Janet's. She looked lovely, Arthur thought. In his heart he had already constituted himself her protector, and he resented with all the ardor of a fiery nature the cold, creeping courtesy of this strange schoolmaster guarding so jealously the almost inhuman discipline of his establishment.

"Miss Mercer, your pupils will love you," Haskell was saying in his soft, purring voice.

"I think it is so much more important that they should love the subjects I teach," she answered crisply, shrinking back from his too close proximity.

"They will love both." He rose, fixed them with a queer, intense glare of a glance. "I recommend you all to go to your rooms. The work will begin in earnest tomorrow."

They heard his footsteps echoing down an apparently endless corridor. Mrs. Denver folded up her napkin, and taking a pin from her dress pinned it carefully. Payne was staring at the tablecloth. Janet's fair face seemed like a gleam of summer in the soft light of the candles and her eyes, wistful, half fearful, drew Arthur's heart to that shadowy region where love begins. He stepped to the door. "They keep this place very dark."

"Come in out of that corridor, Mr. Fleming," Payne commanded "and let's—talk."

Arthur turned back. The two women were sitting in a listening attitude. "I thought I heard a voice," Mrs. Denver said.

"So did I," Janet echoed.

"I want to make a pact," Payne announced. "One doesn't have to teach psychology to know when a situation rings strange. Let us hold together here, whatever happens."

They looked in each other's faces solemnly. Janet reached out her left hand, and Arthur took it. They made a ring. Far off a bell struck."

"There, at last I've heard a bell," Mrs. Denver sighed. "I don't think I could have slept tonight if I hadn't heard just one bell."

CHAPTER II

When Janet had said good night to Mrs. Denver, she bolted her door and wondered whether she would be able to sleep. Ready for bed, she put out her light, and, raising the shades at her windows saw that the rain was over, and the moon, a little past the full, had risen and was illuminating the gardens, casting long ragged shadows of the pines across the unkempt lawns. While she looked and mused over the strange situation, two figures emerged from the gloom of the trees—in one of them she recognized the principal of the school; but the other was a man fully six feet three inches tall; and with long arms like a gorilla. His broad, whitish face was bored into by black eyes, and slashed rather than featured by a great, red mouth. His appearance was so terrifying she sank on her knees and drew the lace window curtains between her face and the window. Who was he? A man-of-all-work?

Whatever he was, he was in the confidence of his master. They advanced slowly, in earnest conversation. At last they paused beneath her window, ceased talking, and gazed up steadily for about two minutes.

Her heart beat so violently that she felt they must hear it. All at once the moon went under a cloud, and their scrutiny ceased. She stole into bed, and, in spite of her fears, was soon asleep.

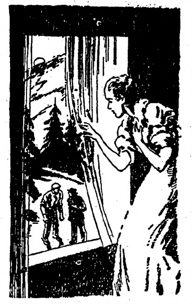
How long she had slept she did not know when she found herself all at once wide awake, sitting up in bed, and wondering if a far-off sound of feet had been actual or part of a dream. Not hearing it again, she lay back on her pillow and went over the events of the day, her mind now alert and active. Fear gave way to curiosity. Why had Haskell segregated his four teachers on this floor? Why had he wished to keep them away from the scholars?

Her curiosity strengthening with every moment, she resolved at last on a bold move. This strange principal had probably gone to bed. She would creep down and explore the ground floor of the academy and probably find some clue to the mystery. Acting at once on this resolve, she put on her clothes, and softly stepped out into the corridor and made her way down the curved staircase to the central hall.

There she stood for a moment in uncertainty, but started at last toward a door, to reach which she had to pass the glass door of the study room where the scholars had been so industriously bent over their books. As she went by she instinctively glanced in. The room was flooded with moonlight. And to her horror she saw the four forms still leaning their heads over their desks, absolutely motionless.

For a moment she wanted to scream; to run in terror from this house. Were they still forms of the dead or were they dummies—put there—for what purpose?

Very softly she tried the door; it was unlocked; and she entered, closing the door behind her and calculating the amount of courage it would require to approach the nearest figure, which was that of a young boy. His head, covered with thick brown hair, was supported in hands which had a waxy look; and he was hunched in a lifelike manner over his book. Very softly she stole toward him, when sounds came from the hall which sent a chill to her heart. She dropped down behind one of the big desks and close to the figure, which she now saw was a wax dummy. Peering out of her shadow she perceived two heads close together, their white faces staring steadily through the glass door into the schoolroom. She recognized the immense gorilla-like man she had seen on the campus, and Gordon Haskell.



Her Heart Beat So Violently That She Felt They Must Hear It.

She shook like a leaf in her hiding place, praying fervently that they would not enter the room. To her intense relief, they turned away, and she heard their retreating footsteps. A faintness had nearly overcome her; but a rush of the old fighting spirit, when she found herself again comparatively safe, brought her to full consciousness.

The waxen boy drew her eyes again, half fearfully, half curiously she crept nearer to him. His face was noble, absorbed, a slight smile on the firm lips and in the deep, studious eyes over which his long lashes curled. She did not dare rise yet, but she reached up her hand and touched the waxen hand laid with such resolution on the desk. Why did he seem so alive! so vibrant! why did he smile as if he had something to tell her! She noticed that all four figures bore a kind of family resemblance to each other; and on all four faces was a look of gentle resignation, as if they had something to communicate when their hour should come.

Whoever had made these figures had been a true artist. They were as far beyond waxwork as a Leonardo drawing is beyond the efforts of a schoolgirl: grief, amazement, exquisite tenderness, seemed by turn to have guided their composition. The two girls—a little younger than their "brothers"—were of a workmanship as subtly calculated to envisage beauty and innocence as was possible. Their lovely eyes in the moonlight were bent upon their books; their curls fell thick about their slender necks—columns fit to adorn some little circular temple of Eros.

Terror of these figures began to stir in her—terror of them in their immobile beauty; their everlasting pursuit of an education that would never be finished; their half wistful, secretive smiles as over some inexplicable memory. She began to move from them, dragging her feet as in a nightmare, and turning her head constantly to look at them lest one of them should rise and follow her and try to detain her. This horrid fancy faded; and as she neared the door a great pity and gentleness replaced the fear. It was foolish! They knew nothing, yet she must step softly not to awaken them from their trance of study.

TO BE CONTINUED.

Milk on Water Lures Fish

Fishing in slow-moving or sluggish water can be stimulated by pouring milk on the surface ahead of the boat. As soon as this spreads and permeates the water the fish wake up and begin biting.—Detroit News.

Possibility of Change in Time's Measurement

Back in the days when monarchs were all that the word implies, Augustus Caesar added a day to August, the month of his birth, to put it on a par with July, which commemorates Julius Caesar. It would scarcely be worth while to estimate the cost of that act of vanity during the last 1,942 years. Even the energy spent by calendar reformers in trying to correct this and other irregularities in the measurement of time is considerable. But it is worthy of note that persistent efforts are still being made to substitute for the Roman calendar a more systematic measure of time.

Interest in this subject is attested by the fact that 29 nations have appointed committees to confer with the League of Nations regarding it. The Eastern Orthodox church, with a membership of 140,000,000 persons, recently endorsed the so-called world calendar. Its action is especially significant because much of the opposition to calendar reform has come from churches and other organizations that oppose the shifting of significant historical dates. If opposition from these sources is overcome, the difficulties of securing a new calendar will be greatly minimized.

Adoption of a 13-month calendar now seems to be out of the question. Most of the reformers appear to be swinging to the improved 12-month calendar of 364 days plus one year day that would not be placed in any month. Under this plan the year can be divided into equal quarters, each containing precisely 13 weeks. Each quarter would begin with a month containing 31 days, and would contain two other months of 30 days each. Every month would contain 26 working days, thus eliminating most of the irregularities between the months so far as business statistics are concerned.

In view of the fact that the solar year is 11 minutes less than 365¼ days it is probably impossible to devise a calendar without irregularities. But many improvements can be made in the present system.—Washington Post.

American Turkeys on French Tables in 1575

French royalty had the privilege of enjoying American turkeys on their tables nearly a half century before the colonists at Plymouth Rock feasted on that noble fowl the first Thanksgiving day, says the National Geographic Magazine. As early as 1575 thirty French vessels visited St. Simon and the other bits of land that make up the Sea islands along the coast of Georgia. They came to barter with the Indians for turkeys, sassafras and deer and beaver peltries. One report states that more than 10,000 wild turkeys were purchased from the Indians in one year.

The sassafras roots which the French carried back with them were made into tea, and the brew soon became popular in Europe as a cure-all, after the manner of some of our patent medicines today. In the South sassafras tea is still drunk in springtime to "thin the blood."

St. Simon island has other historic associations. Where yachts and speedboats now lie at pier, oak timbers were loaded in 1794 and shipped north for the construction of America's infant navy. From these outgoing live oaks was shaped the famous United States frigate Constitution, known and endeared to every American citizen as Old Ironsides.

STRONG RULERS IN THE ORIENT

Careers Reminiscent of "The Arabian Nights."

There are still men in the Orient who have had careers typical of "The Arabian Nights," but even in the Orient a certain change seems to have occurred. No longer does the good will of a eunuch, the pleasure of a pasha, or the love of a princess bring advancement, but, remarkable as it may seem, courage, courage, courage—with luck and diplomacy added.

Mustapha Kemal Pasha had such a career, rising from the position of commander of a Turkish army corps on the Palestine front to ruler of modern Turkey. Riza Shay had such a career, rising from noncommissioned Cossack officer to Cossack colonel, then from colonel to prime minister and then emperor of Persia.

King Ibn Saud had such a career. He was born a son of an exiled Arabian monarch and set out at the age of eighteen to win back his father's kingdom, just as the prince in "The Arabian Nights" goes to do battle against the evil jinnee.

And between these three soldiers ruled a fourth king from "The Arabian Nights," living in Bagdad, the city of Harun al-Rashid. He, too, was a new man on the throne, who had also commenced his career on the field of battle. He, too, was a figure out of "The Arabian Nights," but King Faisal of Irak was a very different kind of man from his three neighbors.

The delicate descendant of a line of aristocratic priests, he adapted himself to the more robust methods of the new politics of the Orient. King Ibn Saud, his southern neighbor, is physically the strongest man in his kingdom, a man of unlimited vital energy who has been married 150 times, although he never has more than four wives at once. His western neighbor, Riza Shah, is at least as big a man as Ibn Saud, and, whereas the king of Arabia is a comparatively slender man, the shah of Persia looks like a Pomeranian Junker, bony, muscular, with a square head and powerful jaw. The dictator of Turkey is built in the same way. He is an old soldier who can always summon up his ultimate physical reserves for battle or pleasure.—Dr. Wolfgang von Weise in the Neue Freie Presse, Vienna.

New Automobile Horn Failed to Lure Hogs

For the past three years James Middlebrooks, a Pierce county farmer, has been calling his hogs with the horn on his automobile, relates a New York Times correspondent. A large landowner in this and adjoining counties, about every two weeks he would visit his different places and sound the horn of his car. Hogs and pigs would come running from every direction.

Recently he started out on his customary bimonthly check-up, and, stopping at his first place, sounded his horn. It sounded loud and clear, but no hogs came from the woods.

The farmer sounded his horn several times before he realized why the hog-calling method he had used successfully a hundred times before was not producing results. He had traded automobiles the week before, and his new car had a different-sounding horn.

He located the old horn in Jacksonville, Fla., and reclaimed it.—Literary Digest.

Use for Dried Flies

Dried flies find a ready market in England. They are imported from South America. They are used to feed captive birds and goldfish. Hundreds of natives are employed in netting the insects on the tropical rivers. The latest shipment of this strange trade has just arrived in London. Some of the specimens in the two tons were four inches long.

STATE FAIR NIGHT SHOW BEST EVER

Diamond Jubilee Spectacle Climaxes Seventy-five Years of Entertainment Excellence.

Climaxing 75 years of entertainment excellence, the Minnesota State Fair will observe its Diamond Jubilee, September 1 to 8, with a $100,000 program that will combine new and greater thrillers, more costly attractions and unexcelled showmanship.

Variety is the keystone of the program that commemorates the 75th birthday of the World's greatest State Fair. A colossal night show, swirling automobile events, gorgeous fireworks, stirring horse races, superaeronautical thrillers, America's premier horse show, a championship trapshooting tournament, band music, a midway boasting 40 rides and attractions are only the high spots of this sterling amusement symposium.

Fitting recognition of the Exposition that marks three-quarters of a century of progress is the spectacular night show—Diamond Jubilee—the finest in the Fair's history. Produced especially for this occasion, the night show spectacle reaches a new high in outdoor entertainment.

Stirring Scenes Included

The audience, literally transported by magic carpet, will be treated to scene after scene of super-entertainment, all blending into the mighty Diamond Jubilee Revue, from which the production takes its name. Crowded into the spectacle will be a realistic battle between Scouts and Soldiers, reminiscent of frontier days. Reenacting the Days of Jenny Lind, the Swedish Nightingale, whose marvelous voice and artistry made her the most famous diva of her day, Madam Signe Stromwall, will be assisted by the renowned Alanoff Ballet and the sterling Odeon Octet.

And the Gay Nineties. A flash-back to the days of the brown derby, bustle skirts and the Bowery, with its comedians and chorines and those world-famous crazy carpenters—the Willie West and McGinty troupe—will provide a riot of laughs.

Aquatic Fantasy in Finale

All the glory and splendor of Minnesota's own out-of-doors will be presented in Land O' Lakes, an aquatic fantasy, in which a bevy of beautiful water nymphs, gorgeously costumed, disappear in a sunken garden built into the stage.

In the feature scene the Diamond Jubilee Revue, Glorified American Beauties—48 of them—will participate in the finale in which Miss Minnesota emerges from a gorgeous, diamond-jewelled setting to reign supreme over the spectacle of pomp and ceremony. It will be most inspiring.

The race track, as usual, will provide thrills—and maybe spills. The world's greatest auto racers will compete on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday, September 3, 5 and 8. Horse racing, including both harness events and runners, will be featured Saturday, Tuesday and Thursday, September 1, 4 and 6.

Thrill Day Set for Friday

Friday will be Thrill Day. The "Spread-Rail" head-on locomotive collision, the first of its kind in the show world, will be the super-event. Motorcycle racing, balloon ascensions and parachute jumps from both balloons and airplanes and a board-wall automobile crash are a few of the hair-raisers that will thrill the audience.

America's premier horse show, a $10,000 competition, scheduled for five nights, September 3 to 7, will bring together the finest riders and show horses of the nation.

On the midway will be the Royal American Shows, featuring 40 new rides and attractions, including many world's fair features.

20 Years Ago

From the Holt Weekly News for August 28, 1914

The Republican postmaster at Thief River Falls gave way to a Democrat, because "to the victors belong the spoils." Again we are reminded of that Bible verse, Hebrews 13:8.

More new buildings were going up at this time; Ed Silbaugh's hall, with living rooms above (now Bennes' confectionery), Chris Yttri's house in the north end of town, and J. B. Alkenbrack's house in the south end.

Sigurd Vik and Elling Tollefsrud brought in a tractor to use on their farms in Golden Valley.

Frank Tabor drilled wells for Ingebret Moe and Ole Christenson.

P.L. Anderson, L.A. Jenson, S. S. Kolden, and H. J. Oien excursioned to T R Falls in a autymobeel.

The World War busted out in earnest, with half a dozen battles being fought at once in Belgium.

And Pope Pius X died at Rome.

Farmers, Notice!

I will be thru Holt every Wednesday afternoon. If you have any work for me leave word at the Holt Cafe.

Views and Reviews

[The views below do not necessarily coincide with the official beliefs of this publication; they are merely personal observations.]

One thing the depression has done—it has awakened an interest in economics. Every person you meet has ideas concerning the so-called "dismal science", and most of them have a cure-all for existing ills. This has its good and bad points. Life may become one long string of arguments—but at least it will never become boresome.

Hitler jokes never cease. Now they're telling this one:

On a recent tour through Germany, Hitler was scheduled to visit an insane asylum. The inmates were taught to salute and say, "Heil, Hitler!"

The great day came; the entire population of the asylum were in formation as the great man passed; and they all saluted except one man. Immediately Hitler's aides pounced upon the poor fellow and asked for an explanation.

"Well, you see," the man explained, "I'm not insane."

If the New Deal is unpopular, President Roosevelt is not. While daily newspapers were conducting straw votes, which indicated that there is a growing opposition to the New Deal, the nation's chief was meeting enthusiastic crowds thruout the country, on his recent tour.

A comparison between Hoover and Roosevelt reveals the secret of the latter's popularity. Hoover reluctantly did things which the public saw were necessary months before action was taken. Roosevelt, on the other hand, is always a jump or two ahead of the public—he is always pulling something unexpected.

Even if the sum total of his achievements is not much, Roosevelt is keeping the crowd interested, and is probably doing as much as any man could do under the circumstances.

It's a curious fact that history repeats itself about every thirty years. That is the average life of one generation. Thus, within the next ten years, we may see the world again converted into a slaughterhouse. The infinitesimal portion of sense which one generation transmits to the next is what we call "progress." —B C.H.

Work on Mud Lake Project Will Begin Soon, Is Report

Actual work on the improvement of the Mud Lake migratory bird nesting ground and refuge will be started this this fall, E.V. Willard, state commissioner of conservation said recently, following a conference with federal officials, according to the Associated Press.

Willard conferred with J. C. Salyer, in charge of land acquisition of the United States bureau of biological survey, and S. H. McCrory, chief of the bureau of agricultural engineering, U. S. department of agriculture. The two federal officials have just completed an inspection tour of the area.

The restoration of Mud Lake is regarded as one of the most important units in the new federal program for restoring wild life, and it is reported the federal government is prepared to spend several hundred thousand dollars on the project.

Five Weeks on Wheels

High Lights of An Auto Tour to the West Coast

III. Over the Mountains to the Sea

We are pulling out of Livingston, Montana now after a good rest in a beautiful, shady park on the banks of the Yellowstone river. We camped right below a large mountain peak that just seemed to overhang the city. There were about fifty tourist cars that stopped overnight at this place and, the evening was spent discussing politics, roads and other conditions in whatever state you were from.

One can find out a lot about our states when you meet folks from fifteen different states in one tourist park. They are all sociable and talkative. Each has some interesting subject that he likes to discuss, and the time flies by in a hurry.

We rolled rolled along northwest and came to Helena the capital city of Montana. They have the best state capitol building there that we saw on our trip. We visited the state capitols in eight of the eleven states that we traveled thru. Helena is a swell little city and is nestled up in the Rockies at a 4000 feet elevation above sea level.

After a few hours in Helena we struck out to climb the high mountains to the west and we crossed the continental divide in McDonald pass after a hard fourteen mile climb. The going down on the west side gave us our first thrill of coasting down a real mountain slope. There we followed a river down thru Hell Gate Canyon arriving in the beautiful city of Missoula, Montana. There also camped over night and took a good look at the country about us.

Striking out again, we still had a hundred and twenty-nine long miles before we came to the Idaho state line. We sailed fast thru Idaho, only spending a few hours in the beautiful mountains they have there. We crossed a very sharp mountain called "Camel Hump" and it made our Chev snort. Driving in and out among the trees in the large forests: the steep cliffs and deep canyons for a hundred miles, we came into Coeur d' Alene. Say, there was a beautiful place. Idaho has a lot to offer you even if it seems to be all mountains.

We stopped and looked over the city and the pretty lake by the same name. There seemed to be a lot of business there, and there were mines working and saw mills going all along up in the mountains. The valleys had all kinds of small farms in them. Another hour and we were in Spokane, Wash. After a meal and a little rest, we went and called at the Frank Coppay home. Mr. and Mrs. Coppay had left that morning for good old Minnesota. We spent about an hour there with their son-in-law. The Coppay family spent many years in Holt before they moved to Spokane where they now have a nice home.

It was still early in the day and we had only come 220 miles from Missoula, so we hit the trail thru the big Washington wheat fields for fifty miles. Cutting southwest, we soon came into a dry desert. There the thermometers stood stock still at 135 in the shade. Oh, where was the shade?. After a hundred mile drive thru the desert we came to the mighty Columbia river, which we crossed near Vantage and zoomed up into the the mountains and tied up for the night at Ellensberg, Wash., after a 430 mile jump from over at Missoula, Montana, all in one day.

Our next stop was at Seattle. We arrived there after a wonderful drive thru the apple country and crossed the Cascade Mountains thru Snoqualmie Pass. After a few hours visit in the big city we took a ferry over to the Vashon Island. There we spent a night at the home of Rev. and Mrs. O. I. Raaum. They had a wonderful home on the Island.

Ernest Raaum, who attends school in Minneapolis in the winter time, was home and farmed a good crop of loganberries. Rev. Raaum served a small congregation there and besides that he took care of several hundred chickens. We also visited at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Gerhard Raaum. They all sent their best regards to their many friends at Holt. The Vashon Island is about 15 miles long and about 5 miles wide with several small communities on it. It was a real beauty spot.

From there we went to Tacoma and Puyallup where we also spent a night at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Syverin Mork and family. We had a real visit with them and their son-in-law who lives in Tacoma. Mr. Mork has a big raspberry farm and this year he shipped out many tons of berries.

When we left there we called at the homes of Ole Grove, Ole Nybo and Tinus Nybo. They were busy picking the berries they raised on their ten-acre farms. The country around Puyallup was very productive, and it seemed that almost any kind of a fruit did well there.

We moved on again, and made a stop in Olympia to visit for a while at the state capital and in the parks of the city. Going on south, we passed thru beautiful country around Centralia, Chehalis and Kelso. We also visited the new city of Longview. There the Long-Bell Lumber company have the largest saw mills in the world. The city is only a few years old, and is one of the best planned and modern in every way. The promoters of this new city also built a very large high bridge over the Columbia river at this point, but when the big crash came in 1929 they could not pay for it, so the Bethlehem steel corporation of Pennsylvania, from whom they bought the steel, took it over and made a toll bridge out of it.

We did not cross at this point as we wanted to see the country on the east side of the river on our way to Portland. We rolled into Vancouver, Wash. That city is beautifully set out on the north bank of the Columbia river across from Portland, Oregon.

We again crossed the river and pulled into the busy city of Portland and made a bee line at 50 per for the home of my brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Therkilsen.

More next week as we still have 4500 miles to go. So—long.

John Bordewich, Marshall County Sheriff, Dead

John P. Bordewich of Warren, 54 years old, sheriff of Marshall county the past eight years and prominent throughout the Northwest as an officer of the law, died unexpectedly about 9 p. m. Saturday as he was conferring with Sheriff J. M. Lund and other northwest peace officials in Grand Forks.

Mr. Bordewich had gone to Grand Forks to attend a conference on this district to make plans for stopping robberies in the Red river valley, the thirteenth one in the last month being pulled at Grand Forks last Friday night when the state highway department building there was looted.

Mr. Bordewich has lived in Warren for the last 25 years and first became associated with the sheriff's office in 1913 when he was appointed deputy. He was elected sheriff in 1926 and would have completed his third term next January 1. He is survived by his wife and five children, Mrs. Arnold Revak of Minneapolis, Miss Kathryn Bordewich of Montevideo, Minn., and John Jr., Robert and Paul Bordewich all of Warren.

Funeral services were held at Warren Wendesday. We extend our sympathy to the bereaved family in their hour of sorrow.

The Reason Why - -
The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.
For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.
If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

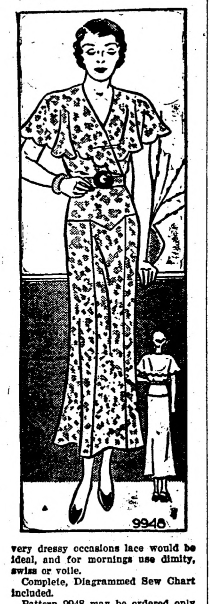
FASHIONED FOR LARGER FIGURES

PATTERN 9948

Nothing works quite the magic on the larger figure like a deep cape and slender paneled seamings—and these are the fashion points found in this charming model. The cape is large, scalloped and gracefully flared, and follows the surplice line of the bodice closing. A snug hip yoke and the aforementioned panels keep the figure straight below the waistline. For afternoons in warm weather, georgettes and chiffons are lovely—in colorful prints or monotones. For very dressy occasions lace would be ideal, and for mornings use dimity, swiss or voile.



Complete, Diagrammed Sew Chart included.

Pattern 9948 may be ordered only in sizes 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 requires 4 yards 39 inch fabric.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Send your order to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 232 West Eighteenth Street, New York.

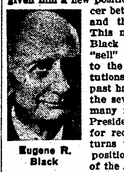
Eugene Black to "Sell" New Deal to the Banks—President Warns Against Food Profiteering—Cotton Textile Strike Voted.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

EUGENE R. BLACK has resigned as governor of the federal reserve board, and President Roosevelt has given him a new position—contact officer between the banks and the government. This means that Mr. Black is expected to "sell" the New Deal to the financial institutions, which in the past have been among the severest critics of many features of the President's program for recovery. He returns to his former position of governor of the Atlanta Federal Reserve bank which he left in May, 1933, to assume the direction of the whole reserve system.



Eugene R. Black

Mr. Black himself said his new assignment is "to muster the strength of our financial institutions behind recovery in America." Some observers in Washington thought the move indicated that the administration was going to make another attempt to thaw out the vast sums in commercial credits that are lying idle in the banks.

"You can do much good," President Roosevelt wrote Black in accepting his resignation, "by presenting the recovery program to the country's reserve banks, commercial banks and other financial institutions, by acquainting them with the successive steps taken by the administration which have resulted in the present prosperous condition of these institutions and which make possible their co-operation with the administration in its program of complete business rehabilitation.

"I am pleased to think that your position as governor of the Federal Reserve bank at Atlanta will give you opportunity to undertake this work and that that bank, together with the federal reserve board, will co-operate with you in its performance."

Among those mentioned as likely to succeed Black as governor of the federal reserve board was Marriner S. Eccles, Utah banker, who is now a special assistant to Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau. He is close to Rexford Guy Tugwell.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, it turns out, is not at all dismayed by the catastrophic drouth that has afflicted a large part of the country. To the White House correspondents he indicated his belief that the drouth was in a way a blessing, in that it was wiping out farm surpluses two years sooner than could have been done by the Wallace crop reduction plan. He expressed the belief that there will be plenty of food for all, and made it clear that the administration would not stand for any profiteering in food prices or grain speculation to the detriment of the farmer and the public. "Chiselers," it was promised, will be promptly and severely punished.

The federal grain futures administration directed by J. M. Mehl, it was revealed, is watching grain trading closely. The first evidence of manipulation will bring punitive action.

The consumers council of the AAA under Dr. Frederic C. Howe, is charting food prices. Housewives will be warned of any increase out of line with market supplies.

Secretary Wallace has admitted that there will necessarily be increases in food prices, and figures released by his department show they are already beginning to go higher.

WHILE Harry Hopkins, federal relief administrator, is vacationing in Europe, his place is taken by Aubrey Williams, his assistant. Mr. Williams has been in conference with the President, laying out the plans for drouth relief and the conservation of food supplies. Among the first things the relief administration will do is to buy up hay and fruit that otherwise might go to waste. Hay on public lands also will be cut and baled. The complete program was being formulated by Mr. Williams and Secretary Wallace. It was expected this would include expenditure of $350,000,000 left in the special drouth appropriation, and distribution of food and clothing to the needy by the surplus relief corporation. Aid for live stock is to be provided.

Aubrey Williams

Mr. Roosevelt is determined that the relief administration shall be kept clear of politics. At his suggestion telegrams were sent to relief directors and workers everywhere telling them to keep out of partisan politics and to resign if they wish to run for office.

WHEN the NRA is reorganized and put under control of a commission—a change that is soon due—Gen. Hugh S. Johnson may still be in the picture, despite the belief that he would retire completely. He told something of the plans for the shake-up, and at the same time said: "If the President wants me to stay, I might serve as chairman of the board, provided it did not take all of my time."

Johnson said he expected the whole reorganization of the NRA to be completed within the next 60 or 90 days. The first step, he said, will be the formal submission of plans to the President. Congress will be asked next winter to enact the revised NRA set-up as a permanent government control over industry, Johnson disclosed. It will be the New Deal for business which President Roosevelt will try to fix on the country for all time.

This "permanent" NRA, as sketched by Johnson, would consist of a general governing board, a single administrative officer to carry out the board's dictates, and a long string of government representatives sitting on code authorities as umpires in disputes between employers and workers and between industry and the public. Broadly speaking, the NRA might retreat and allow business greater freedom.

UNLESS President Roosevelt can prevent it, about half a million workers in the cotton textile industry will be on strike on or about September 1, because they are utterly dissatisfied with their NRA code. The convention of the United Textile Workers of America in New York voted mandatory instructions to the union's executive council to call this general strike, and if it goes into effect it may later spread to other branches of the industry, involving an additional 250,000. Leaders in the strike movement are Norman Thomas, former Socialist candidate for President, and the younger element in the union.

The specific aim will be to obtain a reopening of the textile code and its revision along lines demanded by the union. Demands will be made for the 30-hour week with 40-hour pay, elimination of the stretch-out system with corresponding readjustment of machine loads, and a universal system of collective bargaining on the basis of free choice of representatives by the workers.

PRIMARY elections in several states brought about interesting results. In Nebraska Representative E. R. Burke of Omaha, advocate of the New Deal, won the Democratic nomination for senator, defeating Gov. Charles W. Bryan by an astonishing plurality of more than 66,000. The Republicans nominated Robert G. Simmons. It was predicted by friends of Senator Norris, radical Republican, that the progressive Republicans would support Burke, for Simmons, a member of congress, has been attacking the NRA and the AAA.

E. R. Burke

Ohioans are given their choice between two veteran politicians in the race for the senate. A. V. Donahey, three times governor of the state, was made the nominee of the Democrats, running far ahead of Gov. George White and Charles O. West. The last named was the choice of the national administration but he made a poor showing. Senator Simeon D. Fess, one of the most vociferous opponents of the Roosevelt programs, easily won renomination by the Republicans. For governor the Democrats nominated Martin L. Davey, the "tree doctor," and the Republicans put up Clarence J. Brown.

Gov. J. M. Futrell of Arkansas was renominated, as were all but two of the state's congressmen who sought re-election. Democrats of Idaho are so well satisfied with Gov. Ben C. Ross, former cowboy, that they renominated him for a third term. The Republican nominee there is Frank L. Stephan.

Looking over these primary results and considering the prospects all over the country, Democratic leaders in Washington predicted their party would gain six senate seats. Republican campaign managers said the G. O. P. will hold its own. As for the house, the Democrats admit they will lose at least twenty-five seats, and their opponents claim the Republican gain will be between fifty and seventy-five seats.

RELATIONS between Russia and Japan have been further strained by the arrest of 17 Soviet subjects, all officials and employees of the Chinese Eastern railway, by Manchukuo authorities. They are accused of plotting against Manchukuo and Japan and of being in collusion with bandits in recent attacks on the railway. The Russian consul general at Harbin vainly demanded the release of the prisoners. In Moscow the arrests gave rise to rumors that Japan was preparing to declare military law and take over the railway, the sale of which has long been a subject of fruitless negotiation.

Tokio dispatches quoted a foreign office spokesman as saying the government was considering sending a general warning to Moscow.

WITH the sanction of the American Federation of Labor a strike was called in the plants of the Aluminum Company of America, which is controlled by Andrew W. Mellon, former secretary of the treasury, and his family. Six of the plants, at New Kensington, Arnold and Logan's Ferry, Pa., Alcoa, Tenn.; East St. Louis, Ill., and Massena, N. Y., were closed, and those at Fairfield, Conn., and Baden, N. C., were about to shut down. The company normally employs about 15,000 persons. Proposals offered by the workers' representatives late in July were flatly rejected by the company.

PRINCE RUDIGER VON STARHEMBERG of Austria, who has just been in Italy consulting with Premier Mussolini, says the Austrian goverment expects a new Nazi outbreak in that country within the next few months. He says he has information that a putsch is being prepared, and that he distrusts the peace talk of the German government. He also doubts the reports of the dissolution of the Austrian Nazi Legion in Germany, and believes the reich is still financing the Nazi in Austria. The prince's statements are borne out by the fact that Austria has sent a note to Great Britain, France and Italy, asking permission to enlarge its army because it fears another Nazi putsch is imminent.

Prince Von Starhemberg

Starhemberg asserts that an overwhelming majority of the Austrian people are in favor of the Hapsburg restoration, that the Vatican is for it, and that Italy and England are neutral; but that France and the little entente would oppose it.

TWENTY years ago, August 16, 1914, the Panama canal was opened to traffic, and the figures given out on the anniversary are interesting. During the canal's existence 80,122 commercial vessels have passed through it. Tolls collected totaled $369,287,018. A total of 386,669,957 tons of cargo were carried, and the net tonnage of the ships using the canal was 368,940,519.

United States shipping totaled 35,123 vessels, which paid $161,668,419 in tolls and carried 177,908,314 tons of cargo. It had 43.8 per cent of the vessels, 47.6 per cent of the tonnage, the same percentage of tolls, and 48.5 per cent of the cargo carried.

British shipping was second, with 21,874 ships, $96,022,682 in tolls, and 96,204,912 tons of cargo. The Norwegians were third, with 4,672 vessels, $16,316,789 tolls, and 20,148,449 tons of cargo. German ships numbered 3,317; Japanese, 2,858; Dutch, 1,676, and then came the French, Danish, and Swedish.

SENATOR HUEY LONG was marching rapidly toward victory over his arch foe, Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley of New Orleans, and there didn't seem to be anything the latter could do to stop the Kingfish. The state legislature, safely in the control of Long and his henchman, Governor Allen, was swiftly pushing through a series of measures designed to put every parish and city of Louisiana in the grip of those two gentlemen before the state primary on September 11. The legislators also passed a bill for an investigation into the affairs of New Orleans.

ABOUT 600 grizzled members of the Grand Army of the Republic were able to attend the sixty-eighth encampment at Rochester, N. Y., and many of them even insisted in marching in the parade, scorning the automobiles that carried their feebler brothers. Commander-in-Chief Russell C. Martin presided over the sessions and the chief speaker was Secretary of War Dern. Mr. Dern told the veterans that the world was seething with unrest and that weak nations might become involved in chaos and war. America, he asserted, is in the grip of another kind of war—one against economic adversity intensified by the terrific drouth—but he expressed confidence "American character, American grit" will win out. He added:

"We will surmount the obstacles ahead of us. And because of this period of trial, ours will be a stronger nation, more ready to meet the other crises which lie in the future. We must be strong."

ADMINISTRATOR JAMES A. MOFFETT inaugurated the housing administration's billion-dollar home repair program, the first loan being made by a Washington bank to Miss Alma McGrum, a home owner, in the presence of many bankers and government officials. Mr. Moffett said credit facilities were available in cities and towns with populations aggregating 39,980,568.

A booklet issued by the housing administration explains that any property owner may apply for a housing loan to any bank, building and loan association, or other finance company approved by the administration for a loan of $100 to $2,000 for improvements on the property. Notes are made to run up to three years and the only security is a good credit standing in the community and a regular income.

The finance companies may not charge more than $5 per $100 in fees, interest, or discounts, and the notes are to be repaid in equal monthly installments. Applications may be made for family residences, apartment buildings, stores, office buildings, factories, warehouses, farm buildings, garages, or any other kind of housing or business property.

Endicott Rock Famous New England Landmark

Next to Plymouth Rock, the most interesting historical landmark in New England, is the famous Endicott Rock at The Weirs, N. H., which may be seen from passing trains. The rock is protected by a granite canopy and is connected with the shore by a short, iron bridge.

The rock marks the northern limit of the pasture grant of the Massachusetts Bay colony, about which there had been considerable dispute.

In 1652, Gov. John Endicott, by order of the general court, appointed a commission consisting of Simon Willard and Edward Johnson to settle forever this dispute. They took with them as surveyors, Jonathan Ince and John Sherman.

After an arduous journey through the wilderness and considerable exploration, they decided that this rock, at the point, marked the head water of the Merrimac river. It was 43 degrees, 40 minutes and 12 seconds north latitude. Under the terms of the patent, the grant went three miles north of this point and running easterly it came out at Upper Clapboard island in Casco bay.

In crude letters the commissioners had inscribed on the rock the name of "John Endicott, Governor," with the initials of the commissioners and surveyors.

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a faculty position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer meets a young man, Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy. At the railroad station they meet Mrs. Denver, engaged as matron. At the school the group is struck by an air of mystery pervading the place. Gordon Haskell, proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne completes the Academy faculty. In a schoolroom Janet finds a group, which the teachers had supposed were scholars, are really highly artistic wax figures.

She peered through the glass door into the hall. No one there! But some one might be watching and waiting for her exit—to spring upon her, or to follow her with their eyes up the curved staircase. To be seen and not to see was dreadful. She crossed the hall as if great weights were on each foot and the pursuers would soon be upon her. Up she climbed, and for a moment stood in the moonlight that streamed through a window at the head of the stairs. Then realizing that this was a conspicuous position, she moved on to the shadow—just as voices reached her from below. One of them was Haskell's, and he was saying in a sharp whisper: "Take those horrible figures down in the basement, Balder. If you ever dare play a trick like that again, I'll horsewhip you."

Peering over the banisters she saw the "gorilla man" enter the schoolroom. Haskell stood guard, but he seemed to shrink back against the wall as his servitor emerged with one of the wax figures under his arm. He carried it nonchalantly, as Janet had seen such figures in department stores carried about, and returned after a time for the others.

She did not wait to see these transfers, but went quickly down the corridor, and, seeing a light under Mrs. Denver's door, she spoke her name softly, and was at once admitted.

The good woman was in a heavy flannel dressing gown and slippers. Her eyes looked as if she had not slept.

"I've been downstairs. I felt I must know what kind of a place we are in."

"Did you see anything?"

"Those four scholars were still in the school room studying!"

"Oh, the cruel man!"

"No, they are wax figures."

"Wax figures! Why, that's dreadful! Do you think he means to murder us?" she added inconsequentially.

"What object would he have in murdering strangers? No! there's something here less simple than killing innocent people."

"Then there are no scholars?"

"Only four wax ones—so far. Mrs. Denver, are you willing to see it through? After all, we really know nothing; it's strange—but strange things are not always criminal. Let's see it through."

"I agree with you. I was never one for running away. My dear, you had better try to get some sleep."

"I intend to."

She stole back to her room. The house lay now in profound silence, but still she had the uncanny sensation that the quiet veiled a sinister activity. Speculating on this, she fell asleep.

She was awakened next morning by a faint tap at her door; then a voice: "Miss Mercer, may I see you as soon as possible?"

She recognized it as Arthur Fleming's. "Yes, in about a quarter of an hour."

"I'll be waiting at the end of the passage."

When she joined him he stood by a window in the morning light with "Hamlet," who seemed deep in his musings. He and Arthur both looked at her curiously.

"Well—how do you feel about it now?" Arthur asked.

"Why do you ask?"

"Payne and I are wondering if we ought to let you stay on here."

"You really think there's danger?"

"Yes."

"What kind?"

"That's just it," Payne remarked; "we don't know. I hate to use a misused word, but I am what is called psychic; or at least I am sensitive enough to scent a sort of menace in this house."

"The gods of destiny are here," she said. "Listen to my adventure." She told them the story of her visit to the schoolroom.

"Ah, you shouldn't have gone down there—it was dangerous," Payne said gravely. "You should have asked me—I saw at once that the figures were wax."

"Why didn't you tell me?"

"Why alarm you?—but Fleming and I talked half the night about it."

"Do you remember what the old farmer said—that it would be easier to come here than to get away! What did he mean?"

Payne shook his head. "There's something queer about the place that he knows and we don't."

"We'll have to talk this over later," Arthur said, looking at his watch. "Let us stop at Mrs. Denver's door, and, if she's ready, go downstairs together."

Janet knocked. "Mrs. Denver," she said gently. There was no answer. They knocked louder—a draught from the windows, perhaps swung the door; it softly opened. They had a glimpse of a made-up bed, of an orderly small collection of toilet articles on the bureau; of a neat black bag at the foot of the bed, but the occupant of the room was not there.

"Let us go down, too," Payne said. "It's a quarter to eight. I should think hungry pupils would be waiting breakfast."

The silence reigning over the great house was profound.

"Really," Arthur remarked, "this is getting on my nerves."

They descended the main staircase and stood uncertainly in the hall; then Janet looked through the glass door of the study room. The figures were absent.

"Ah, breakfast?"

Turning they saw their principal, with a fresh flower in his buttonhole and an air of amiable concern for their health. "Did you sleep well? The first night in a new place is always trying. Miss Mercer, you look somewhat pale. A cup of coffee I prescribe for you—at once."

He led them to a really bright and pretty breakfast room flooded with the morning sunshine. The white paneled walls and bright chintzes were like a guarantee of normality. Even Wilton began to wonder if they had not been over-excited. Steaming coffee, scrambled eggs, muffins, marmalade and fruit were on the breakfast table, hot plates and spirit lamps keeping the cooked food at a point of perfection. They found they were very hungry.

Midway of the meal, Janet put down her fork with a sudden realization. "Oh, where is Mrs. Denver—has she breakfasted?"

"Long ago! She is a very soldier, that little woman; I foresee reveille at six, taps at nine. Mr. Wilton Payne, more coffee? Have you in your psychological studies tabulated the effects of caffeine and other drugs upon human conduct—for example, the actions of the same person on a day begun without coffee? Personally I should not be responsible for my actions on a day initiated without this wonderful coffee bean! More eggs, Miss Mercer?"

They were all feeling better; half ashamed of their suspicions. Only Payne was narrowing his eyes a little as if over a problem. Janet wondered what kind of a girl he would eventually marry; and she pictured one with quiet eyes and a still manner beneath which the keen-eyed Payne could not readily see. And Arthur? His dominance would search for a creature equally strong.

"Are all new teachers favored with breakfast with the principal on the first morning?" she ventured to ask. "Where is the general dining-room of the faculty?"

"Oh, Miss Mercer, we are the faculty—we cozy four. I am a linguist, a historian, I've delved deep into the ancient ramifications of the unfolding spirit of man. You teach English literature and rhetoric; my good friend, Wilton Payne, psychology; Arthur Fleming, mathematics and chemistry. Are not all the arts and sciences, at least by proxy, represented?"

"Of course, with receptive pupils four teachers can do wonders," Arthur commented. "But we are very anxious to meet our pupils!"

"You speak of pupils, Mr. Fleming. In this respect also the academy is ahead of the times. What would you consider the most important element in education?"

Arthur reflected for a moment, quite intent on the honesty of his own answer regardless of consequences. His clear gray eyes looked out on the wild and rugged hills as if in their profoundly purple depths he could read the royal rule of all instructions. "I should say, sir, development of character—the making of splendid citizens."

"And you, Miss Mercer?"

Her smile had the fleeting, lovely quality of a wood nymph pausing to answer an intruder from a dead and settled world. "I should say all education should make people more enchanting and—enchanted."

As she uttered the words her eyes met Arthur's in one of those glances between two young people which are like a dissolving scene in the theater. Almost they held their breath with the wonder of it. They were to be here together through the long autumn days, hidden from the world with an extraordinary chief, and education turned perhaps into real magic—the education of the heart—as well as the head.

"Enchanting—and enchanted," the schoolmaster repeated. "Ah! you show your own theory in yourself, Miss Mercer. Now Payne?"

"Education—a drawing forth of the soul—educe; lead forth. How shy souls are!"

"I congratulate myself on my discernment in choosing three young people of such advanced views in education. Now, has anyone any objection to teaching a handful of day scholars who come from the neighboring farms? It is a most beautiful charity, I assure you; for the young things belong, as a rule, to families too poor to send them to high school or colleges; and they are avidly eager for an education."

CAREER OF MOST DANGEROUS WOMAN ENDS IN PRISON

Robbed Old Women and Old Men and Got Gullible Men to Wed Her.

Philadelphia.—"The most dangerous woman in Philadelphia"—Mrs. Anna Beswick, a mild-mannered lady of fifty-five and the mother of 18 children—has just been safely locked into a cell for a ten-year "stretch."

Judge Frank Smith was thoroughly indignant when he imposed sentence. He said:

"I don't know any woman in Philadelphia who is as dangerous as you are when it involves robbing old women and old men and getting gullible men to marry you."

Mrs. Beswick's dual life would make the more proficient Jekyll-Hydes of the past feel like amateurs. While she was bearing 18 children to a hard-working night-watchman, she was spending her evening hours with William C. Martin, a wealthy banker—as Mrs. Martin.

Many Crimes.

Not only did Beswick, the night-watchman, look upon her as a model wife and mother, but Martin, the banker, never dreamed that she had a husband and family in the poorer section of town. In addition to bigamy and multiple maternity, Mrs. Beswick also had time for a variety of swindles, bad check passing and confidence games.

That astounding triangle might have led the good judge to an expression of horror, but Mrs. Beswick accomplished her most amazing coup while she was in prison on a previous conviction.

There, sentenced as a swindler, she met Edward McElroy, a prison guard. Every evening when Edward saw his elderly charge safely locked up, they had a few words together. He was entranced by her ready flow of chatter and her word pictures of golden harvests in store for her as soon as she got out of jail.

Marries Jail Guard.

Would Edward like to share in her approaching bounty? The guard scratched his head. It was true that Mrs. Beswick was in durance vile for inducing people to believe her against their better judgment. Still, she had a way with her. Maybe she was a nice lady in the grip of circumstances.

Edward McElroy and Mrs. Beswick were married. This union was perfectly legal, it happened, since Martin had had his marriage to her annulled on her first fraud conviction and Beswick was dead. Mrs. McElroy left prison not to rush into the waiting arms of her 18 young ones, but to embark with the bedazzled McElroy on a new swindling sortie.

Their landlady was the first victim. McElroy was waiting to receive payment from a pension fund. He admitted in court that he had inveigled her into advancing him and his wife $84, with the promise of "an automobile" as security. The car, of course, never materialized—and neither did the landlady's $84.

Mrs. Alice L. Clark, another woman with whom the McElroys lived, was cheated out of $144. Mrs. Alice Roberts reported the loss of $133 to them and Mrs. Mary Fogarty advanced them $900 on the promise of an $86,000 or $96,000 return for "kindness"—when Mrs. McElroy "won her suit against her brother, the millionaire pork packer."

Blind Doe Has Twins; Goat Mothering Them

Ithaca, N. Y.—Cornell university's famous blind doe has twin fawns, but a goat is raising them. The youngsters are sturdy, active and happy on their novel diet of rich goat milk, and receive from their foster mother the same solicitious attention their own parent would bestow, were she in proper condition to care for them. The fawns weighed about five pounds each at birth, and were transferred to the goat to obviate the chance of their being trampled under the sharp hoofs of the blind doe. They are of the species known as the Virginia, or white-tailed deer.

Veterinarians at the institution attribute the doe's complete blindness to a cataract infection developing with age. She is rather old for a deer, having passed her tenth birthday, but will be cherished and protected as long as she lives, both as a humane procedure, and for purposes of experiment and observation.

Colorado Springs.—A black angora cat at the Broadmoor-Cheyenne mountain zoo has adopted a coyote pup, which had been named Little Orphan Annie. The mother coyote killed one of her two pups and was about to kill the other one when it was rescued.

Keys Lost in Auto Crash Found Hanging in Tree

Trumbull, Conn.—Last fall Stephen Gutowski lost a bunch of keys when he was thrown from his automobile in an accident. Nearly eight months later they were found dangling high up in a tree at the scene of the collision.

Baby Moose Is Pet

St. George, Maine.—The Earle Barter family pet is a baby moose. Only three days old when found in the woods near here, it is now a husky youngster that consumes six quarts of milk daily.

Schooling Oneself in Control of the Nerves

A nervous woman visiting schools in a large city was observing an English lesson of a first year high school class. She felt "dizzy" and "exhausted."

"How that teacher can stand the strain of trying to give something to thirty wandering attentions that don't want to take it, is more than I can see," she said. "And that class was no exception!" She proceeded to describe it.

As in many modern schools, there was no rule against the pupils talking. And all the time that the teacher read aloud, there was "a continuous buzz of comment and conversation among the children, not all of whom were listening, so that at times the woman actually had to shout to be heard.

"Imagine the nervous strain of trying to teach against such odds! Freedom and relaxation on the part of the teacher to get and hold attention which he should have been able to take for granted. In that teacher's place I should have a complete nervous breakdown in three days!"

I was familiar with the phenomenon this woman described, a prominent woman writer remarks. I had seen teachers trying to give to a large group, some of whom were indifferent about receiving and profiting by what was offered them. I had observed such teachers apparently good-naturedly working against and over a buzz. And I knew the "good nature" to be only apparent, a manifestation of poise and self-control whose source was the knowledge that more could be accomplished by ignoring interruptions than by stopping to reproach and remonstrate and punish. I knew those teachers to be trying a positive method of giving to those boys and girls rather than the negative one of continuous correction and punishment. And I knew they did not have nervous breakdowns—because they had schooled themselves to the situation with which they had to contend. They had cultivated "standability" in circumstances that could not be entirely perfected.

"It is not right," you might say, "that that added burden should be placed upon a teacher—and I should agree with you. But the point that I think worth something to my readers is that trick of cheating nervous breakdowns by schooling oneself—in standability!

HOW HATS HAVE CUT IMPORTANT FIGURE IN PAST

What with the Black Shirts of Italy, the Brown Shirts of Germany, the Red Shirts in Soviet Russia, the present generation might sing its own "Song of the Shirt," though it would be quite different from that of Thomas Hood. And yet—would it be any cheerier than Hood's?

Whatever the significance of shirts in this era, other items of dress have played their larger parts in years gone by. History suggests that people dress not so much for protection as for display, and sometimes to denote differences in social rank. Hats have played their large part, for instance. Everyone is familiar with the three-cornered hat which Napoleon made famous. It became as significant for his time as did the tricolored cockade of the French revolutionists. Was the three-cornered hat of Napoleon designed to continue the tradition of the cockade, or was it just a fashion of the time? At any rate, the Napoleonic hat continues to hold favor.

How much the turban denotes, worn by certain orientals! This headpiece signifies much more than a sash or shawl twisted about a cap. It divides the Orient from the Occident. It suggests rank and caste; it seems much better fitted to a life of quiet and meditation than it would be to western hustle.

Even the soft felt hat, so popular with men in this country, once had international significance. It was worn by the great Hungarian patriot, Kossuth, upon his visit to this country in 1849. So well did it seem to typify his vigorous character that it immediately became popular and has long remained so.

Whether shirts will become as significant as hats in the human record, is an open question. The variously colored shirts of today reflect much history in the making. Surely, it is well for a man to know what shirt he wears and to keep it on if he can.

ROMANCE IN PERSIA

Persia is almost completely unspoiled by the machine age, says Richard Halliburton in Cosmopolitan. There are barely six hundred miles of railroad within its borders. Camel caravans, as in the days of the Magi who came from here, still bear nine-tenths of the commerce, and are still guided by the stars across the wilderness. These caravans must traverse a country sometimes convulsed by gorges and high mountains. Where there are no mountains there is desert. But in the oases one finds gardens so lush and fruitful that they have inspired the poets down the ages.

But it is modern Persia that will attract the average traveler—the roses and the nightingales more than the tombs; the beautiful, artistic people, more than the tumbled ruins.

BANK LOANS AND BUSINESS RECOVERY

Official Describes Efforts of Reserve Banks to Bring Out Deserving Borrowers—Present Situation Typical

Apropos of the part that an expansion of business loans by banks occupies in the early stages of the business recovery which is now gaining headway, a Federal Reserve Bank official recently gave an interesting review of the experiences of his institution in this connection. In 1932 the Federal Reserve Banks were empowered by law to make direct loans to individuals in unusual circumstances when they had been unable to obtain loans from a commercial bank, he pointed out.

From the middle of 1932 to the end of 1933 there were 1,286 applicants for loans at the New York Federal Reserve Bank under this law. The great majority of these applications proved on examination to be for funds for capital purposes, which are properly supplied as an investment in the business, or else were mortgage loans or others unclassifiable as commercial.

Only Fourteen Qualify

Only 250, or less than 20 per cent, were of the type which merited detailed investigation. The amount involved was $9,525,000. After further study of these, the Federal Reserve Bank was forced to turn down the applications of 236, finally offering credit in the sum of $1,417,000 to 14 prospective borrowers. Of this amount, only $806,000 was actually loaned, more than one-half of which was still outstanding many months later. Two of the borrowers went into receivership.

"Since it was the special endeavor of the Federal Reserve Bank to make every possible loan under the emergency provisions of the amendment, and since their best efforts resulted in the extension of so small a sum as to have no effect on the total volume of commercial loans, it is a reasonable assumption that eligible borrowers entitled to bank credit are being provided for by the commercial banks," says the American Bankers Association Journal in commenting on this episode.

It is characteristic, as shown by studies of past business cycles, for changes in the volume of commercial bank credit to follow behind either contraction or expansion of business activity, says a financial writer in the New York Times. This was manifest recently in England's recent recovery where there was a lag between increased business and increased commercial loans.

Views and Reviews

[The views below do not necessarily coincide with the official beliefs of this publication; they are merely personal observations.]

After trying to raise pumpkins this summer, a fellow remarked philosophically that, between the drouth and the depression, it's hard to get anything started. In growing a garden, you wonder why such worthless things as ragweed and quack grass should be endowed with such abundant wim, wigor an' witality, while cabbages, for instance, sicken and die under the most thoroughgoing care and protection. But, it's life. The best things always take a lot of coaxing and cajoling to make them grow, while the world (to pursue our metaphor to the bitter end) is full of wicked weeds, waiting to wanquish the unwary wegetable.

This applies to enterprises of all kinds, from gardens to gun-making.

Which reminds us that the munition makers are now being investigated at Washington. At the hearings, it was shown that in the late World war international ammunition makers remained strictly neutral—that is, they sold powder and shot and shell to all countries, impartially.

The investigators may discover also that in the recent unpleasantness between Japan and China, when the world was against Japan, some American became rich by selling the Japanese several thousand bales of cotton, out of which they made guncotton, a high explosive.

But, after all, what difference does it make if a couple nations get together and dissect each other with powerful explosives? As long as they pay their ammunition bills, we should worry. Pacifists are fools, and conscientious objectors ought to be locked up. A man with sense has no business being in a world like this.

To the student of history, there is something melancholy and significant in all this. War has caused the dissolution of all great nations, from Babylonia, Assyria, down through the Roman Empire to the present. China, one of the oldest of nations, was peaceful up to the present era.

Right now, the world seems to be trembling on the brink of dissolution. It will take able statesmanship to steer clear of the abyss. H. G. Wells calls it a race between education and catastrophe. ---B.C.H.

Harvest Festival Held Sunday

A very large crowd turned out on Sunday for the Nazareth Lutheran church harvest festival held at the F. K. Fredrickson home. This festival is held annually for the purpose of raising money for the church budget.

A very good program had been arranged for the occasion. Rev. Redal spoke in the forenoon and Rev. Trelstad of Middle River gave a talk in the afternoon. The local choir and the Anderson sisters of St. Hilaire sang several beautiful songs. The Holt Community band played several numbers in the afternoon.

The proceeds from the dinner, lunch and refreshment stand amounted to about $80. The weather was cold and blustery for an outdoor gathering but the crowd enjoyed the program and meals very much.

Advice of Inspectors

Quality is a very important factor in the production of cream, with inspectors inspecting all butter that comes on the market, for foreign matter such as flies and other things that may get into the cream, which may result in a total loss of some churnings. Let's all work hand in hand to prevent such happenings.

Five Weeks on Wheels

High Lights of An Auto Tour to the West Coast

by Hans O. Hanson

IV. Portland, Oregon and the Coast

Last week we left you as we were pulling into Portland, Oregon. We spent a few days there at the home of my brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Therkildson. Portland is a very interesting city situated on the south bank of the Columbia river about a hundred and ten miles from the Pacific ocean.

There are about 315,000 people living in that city and there seemed to be a lot of business at all times. We were told that there were 45,000 people there that were getting federal and city poor relief. Some of them were getting part time work and others done nothing for what they got. The thing that seemed wrong to us was, the fact that those whom done part time work were paid too much for the time they put in at it and, besides, they were given eight dollars a week for groceries.

Most of these people lived in modern homes and had a good radio and drove a big car. All those whom we talked to hated to admit that such was wrong but, came back at us with the old story that the world owes us a living and, that they ought to have it without working in such hard times.

From Portland we went to the ocean and spent two days at the beach. The family thought it was fun to see so much water and to get a look at a real ship. It is woderful to lie on the hot sandy beach and listen to the big waves splash. Tourists by the thousands were there from all over. Seaside was the large summer resort where the rich dined, danced, drank and gambled to suit themselves.

From the sea we went inland again taking a two hundred mile drive up the scenic highway along the Columbia river. We saw many beautiful sights along this route. The road was built on the high cliffs above the river. We saw salmons that were four feet long that came out of the river and stood in the clear pools of small mountain streams. There were many high waterfalls and beautiful tunnels along the way from Portland east to Hood River. At Sonny, Ore., we passed thru the Mitchell Point Tunnel. This is the longest window tunnel in the world and, has five large windows hewed out facing the river which runs several hundred feet below the overhanging rock cliff it goes thru.

From Hood River we went south thru the great apple orchards and circled Mount Hood. This 11,253 feet high snow capped peak can be seen at a distance of seventy-five miles on a clear day. We passed around it at a distance of about a mile from the snow line at the peak. After a day of this Columbia river highway and the beautiful moutain scenery, we motored to Salem, Ore. We passed thru a fine farming country in a valley along the Willamette river.

At Salem we visited at the home of Mrs. Andrew Johnson and son Albin. The Johnson family lived in Holt about twenty-five year ago when Mr. Johnson was section foreman here for the Great Northern. He passed away about two years ago.

We took in the state capitol and the city while there and it seemed to be a busy little city. Moving on again we followed the Willamette river south for sixty miles down thru a fertile valley which was doted with a lot of fine farms and beautiful towns. What we had so far seen of Oregon was a paradise.

Taking a course due west at Junction City, we traveled for 75 miles over the Coastal range and came out to the ocean again at Florence. There we crossed Siuslaw river on a ferry and went down along the beach to Reedsport where we also took a ferry across the Umpqua river. We had a very nice drive along the seashore and drove on into Marshfield, Ore., where we put up for the night.

Before coming into that city from the north, we crossed over Coos Bay for two miles on the water. At this point the large Millicoma river comes down out of the mountains to the ocean. The Oregon state highway departmment operates free ferrys at the three places we crossed and, there were two more up on the coastal scenic highway that we missed. We were informed that they had appropriated money for big bridges across all these bays and rivers and, at Marshfield the work on a bridge that it would take two years to complete and costing several million dollars, had already begun.

At Marshfield and North Bend on Coos Bay is one of the largest harbors on the west coast. At the docks we saw a boat from Oslo, Norway, called "Dagfred" and one from England called the "Hawthorne". They were both large lumber freighters that had come to load at the many saw mills in that bay district.

The west is young yet and there are many opportunities out there if a fellow finds the right spot. After a look around in these towns, we drove south for another 140 miles along the big ocean to the very northwest corner of California. There is a lot of beautiful scenery along the coast highway. Sometimes we were at sea level and at other points we were at heights several hundred feet above the sea. On some of the cliffs were places fixed so we could park off of the highway and sit and look down at the sea. We saw many large ships go by about ten miles out at sea.

We visited salmon fisheries, saw mills and many other industries while on this 200 mile drive along the ocean in Oregon. Canned salmon was selling six cents a can higher out there than at the stores here. Figure that out after a 2000 mile haul by railroad.

Lumbering and fishing were main industries in that part of the state near the ocean. We saw some real forests and real logging operations. Good grade dimension stock sold for $8 per thousand feet at the mills and boards of good quality sold for as little as $16 to $24 a thousand.

The freight rates on a car of lumber from the mill to Holt is more than the cost of the lumber by a big margin.

Fruit was cheap in Oregon. We bought apples at 25 a bushel and good peaches for 30 cents a bushel. Cantaloupes sold 1c a piece and they were good too.

California next week.

Bus Jobs Let

The successful bidders on the school bus routes here were Nils Ness, on route 1, Nils Johnson, on route 2 and Kenneth Swan on route 3. Mr. Swan refused the job so the school board hired Ludvig Sagstuen to haul the bus on route 3 at thirty dollars per month.

The Reason Why - -

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

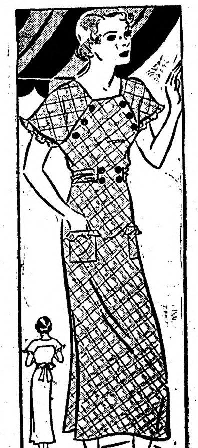
PATTERN 1625

It seems as though life were demanding more and more of women. It used to be that if a woman looked neat and fresh about the house, it was all that anyone could ask of her—but that is not so today. She has to be smart and pretty every moment of her life. After all, though — to be quite fair — why shouldn't she, when a pattern like this costs so little—can be run up in next to no time—and the counters of the cotton goods departments are piled high with ravishing fabrics crying to be taken home for a song?



Pattern 1625 is available in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44. Size 16 requires 3¼ yards 36-inch fabric. Illustrated step-by-step sewing instructions included.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS (15c) in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Write plainly name, address and style number. BE SURE TO STATE SIZE.

Address all orders to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 243 West Seventeenth street, New York City.

Speaker Rainey's Death Starts Race for His Position—Prominent Men Organize Liberty League to Combat Radicalism.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

HENRY T. RAINEY, veteran congressman from Illinois and speaker of the house, died unexpectedly in a St. Louis hospital where he was believed to be recovering from an attack of bronchial pneumonia. The immediate cause of his death was angina pectoris. Mr. Rainey, who was within a day of being seventy-four years old, was first elected to congress in 1902, and he served continuously with the exception of one term, being defeated in the Harding landslide of 1920. He was elected to the speakership when John Nance Garner became Vice President. His control over the house during the sessions of last year and this year, while the President's program was being put through, was gentle but so firm that the legislators were kept well in line.

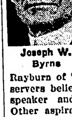
Henry T. Rainey

Mr. Rainey devoted much of his service in Washington to efforts to improve the condition of the farmers, for he held that farm prosperity was essential in any program for national well being. He also was a student of tariff and fiscal subjects. As a Democrat he was always a "regular." He was the author of the tariff commission law and of much other important legislation.

Mrs. Rainey acted as her husband's secretary for years and is so well acquainted with congressional work that the Democrats may select her as the candidate to complete his term as representative from the Twentieth Illinois district.

Mr. Rainey was buried in his home town, Carrollton, after services which were attended by President Roosevelt and many other notable persons.

SPEAKER RAINEY'S death will result in a spirited contest among a number of men who are ambitious to succeed him. First in the line of succession, so to speak, is Representative Joseph W. Byrns of Tennessee, who has been serving as majority floor leader and who is head of the Democratic national congressional committee. President Roosevelt is going to take no part in the race, but the more liberal of the New Dealers are known to favor Sam Rayburn of Texas. Well informed observers believe Byrns will be elected speaker and Rayburn floor leader. Other aspirants for the speakership are John E. Rankin of Mississippi, who has announced his candidacy; William B. Bankhead of Alabama, and John J. O'Connor of New York.



Joseph W. Byrns

Mr. Byrns has been a member of the house continuously since his election to the Sixty-first congress. His work as floor leader, in conjunction with Rainey's rule as speaker, was not especially pleasing to the New Dealers for some months during the last session, but before adjournment most of the misunderstandings were cleared up. In any case, the administration seldom interferes in the selection of the leaders of congress, not wishing to incur the enmity of powerful members of the party.

RETURNING from his swift trip to attend the funeral of Mr. Rainey, the President went directly back to Washington instead of going to his Hyde Park home. This change in plan was due, it was said, to the development of a bitter dispute between Gen. Hugh S. Johnson on one side and Donald Richberg, Mr. Roosevelt's chief industrial adviser, and Secretary of Labor Perkins on the other, over the new structure to be given the NRA.

The issue, it was disclosed, is whether there shall be a board of control in authoritative management of the NRA or a board which shall be more advisory in power, leaving the real control still in the hands of the administrator and his deputies. It was expected Mr. Roosevelt would take command of the situation and determine definitely what shall be done with the recovery administration.

ORGANIZED labor scored a victory over Recovery Administrator Johnson when the national labor relations board ordered John Donovan, former president of the NRA union dismissed by Johnson for "inefficiency," reinstated to his position with the labor advisory board.

"The agencies which are administering the law should in their own dealings uphold its purposes," the board said in its decision, giving a veiled reproof to Johnson for what it implied was a violation of section 7a of the NRA.

With rather bad grace the NRA accepted the rebuke and permitted Donovan to return to his job. Johnson himself had nothing to say about it, but Dr. Gustav Peck, Donovan's immediate superior, issued a statement in which he sniffed at the board's decision and warned Donovan that he would have to "toe the mark."

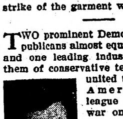
Soon after this the NRA announced that it does not regard itself as obliged to withdraw the Blue Eagle in cases where the national labor relations board has found companies guilty of violation of section 7A of the national industrial recovery act and of subsequent failure to obey the instructions of the board.

The labor board has recommended withdrawal of the Blue Eagle to the NRA compliance board in all cases where companies have disobeyed its instructions to reinstate discharged employees. The decision by the NRA will remove teeth from decisions by the board, since it may now hear cases, make decisions, and find that no penalties are inflicted for disobeying its orders.

COTTON garment code amendments reducing the working hours and giving workers a wage increase have been signed by the President. The amendments, which affect plants in 42 states, are of far-reaching importance.

Sidney Hillman, labor advisory board member and Amalgamated Clothing union head, termed signing of the order "the most far-reaching move NRA has yet made to increase employment." It was hoped that this order would avert the threatened strike of the garment workers.

TWO prominent Democrats, two Republicans almost equally prominent, and one leading industrialist, all of them of conservative tendencies, have united to organize the American Liberty league dedicated to a war on radicalism in the United States. The five founders of the league are: Alfred E. Smith, Democratic Presidential candidate in 1928; John W. Davis Democratic Presidential candidate in 1924; Nathan L. Miller, Republican ex-governor of New York; James W. Wadsworth, Republican congressman from New York, former senator and Presidential possibility for 1936; Irenee Du Pont, manufacturer, who supported Smith in 1928 and Roosevelt in 1932. They believe the league membership will grow into the millions and that it will become an important element in the national life.



Jouett Shouse

For president of the organization the founders selected Jouett Shouse, former chairman of the Democratic national committee and president of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment until repeal was accomplished. In a statement Mr. Shouse set forth the purposes of the league as follows:

"It is a nonpartisan organization, formed, as stated in its charter, 'to defend and uphold the Constitution of the United States and to gather and disseminate information that (1) will teach the necessity of respect for the rights of persons and property as fundamental to every successful form of government, and (2) will teach the duty of government to encourage and protect individual and group initiative and enterprise, to foster the right to work, earn, save, and acquire property, and to preserve the ownership and lawful use of property when acquired.'"

To interviewers Mr. Shouse declared the league was not anti-Roosevelt, but it seemed clear that it will be opposed to most of the major purposes of the New Deal and the radical professors of the brain trust. He said he had visited the President and informed him fully of the purposes of the league, but he would not tell what Mr. Roosevelt's reaction had been.

IN THE nature of a reply to the formation of the American Liberty league was a speech delivered in Washington by Secretary of Commerce Daniel C. Roper. He denied that the "profit motive in American life has been or is to be abolished" by the New Deal, asserting that it seeks only to abolish "certain profit abuses," such as profits on watered stocks and disproportionate salaries.

"Private enterprise," said Mr. Roper, "is getting back upon its own feet, and more and more is exerting its initiative and is able to relieve the federal government of responsibilities, which under normal conditions belong to business.

"Pardon my repeating again that the Roosevelt administration is squarely behind this principle. It believes in just profits for management and capital and an equitable return to labor for its rightful rewards in the economic processes.

"No thinking business man desires to have the old order restored. He does desire and is entitled to have the new order characterized by a better control against economic cataclysms and by the freedom to exercise his initiative in planning for the future of his business in the light of an equitable profit system."

THE strike of truck drivers in Minneapolis was ended when the men and their employers accepted a compromise agreement, and martial law in the city was discontinued, business thereafter speeding back to normal conditions. The peace plan, devised by federal representatives, provided that all employees on strike be returned to their jobs without discrimination and on basis of seniority. It included an agreement to hold an election within ten days in each of the 166 firms involved to determine whether their employees want the drivers' union or other representatives to act for them in collective bargaining, and a pledge of the 166 firms to pay for at least one year not less than 50 cents an hour to drivers and 40 cents to helpers, platform men and inside workers.

WILLIAM GREEN, president of the American Federation of Labor, says he hopes the general strike of textile industry workers will be averted; but he announces at the same time that the federation indorses the strike and will co-operate fully with the officers and members of the United Textile Workers' organization. He appointed federation committees to assist the textile workers and announced that he would draft trained organizers and strike specialists from other unions to assist the textile union.

William Green

George A. Sloan, president of the Cotton Textile institute and chairman of the cotton textile code authority, said the threatened strike is not justified by the facts established by impartial government economists.

Challenging the wage increase demand of the United Textile Workers of America, Mr. Sloan declared that "as a result of three basic wage provisions in the code the hourly wages paid in March, 1934, show an increase of 7 per cent as compared with March, 1933, when there was no code.

"All of this has meant a substantial increase in manufacturing costs," Mr. Sloan said, "and the research and planning division of the NRA found, after a comprehensive investigation last June, that 'under existing conditions there is no factual or statistical basis for any general increase in cotton textile code wage rates.'"

Mr. Sloan estimated the present number of workers at work in some 1,200 mills in the cotton industry at 460,000.

LIEUT.-COL. MARIO HERNANDEZ organized a plot to overthrow the government of President Mendieta of Cuba and establish a military dictatorship, but the authorities got wind of it and frustrated the conspiracy, in which a considerable part of the army was involved. Col. Fulgencio Batista, head of the army, said that Major Benitez and some soldiers were sent to arrest Hernandez and that eight men of the detachment were killed. Hernandez tried to shoot Benitez but was himself shot in the head and neck. The official report said Hernandez was being rushed toward Havana in an automobile and that the car upset, the prisoner being killed, though the others in the car were uninjured.

Maj. Angel Echevarria, commandant of Fourth infantry at Camp Columbia, and Capt. Augustin Erice, chief of the signal corps, conspirators with Hernandez, were captured later and a summary court martial sentenced them to death.

Four thousand troops in Pinar del Rio are confined to barracks, under arrest, and a thorough reorganization of the entire high command of the Cuban army is in full swing. About 200 civilians have also been arrested as parties to the conspiracy, charged with carrying messages to military plotters.

EIGHTY-EIGHT Soviet citizens are now under arrest in Manchukuo, charged with plotting against Manchukuo and Japan and sabotaging Japanese military trains. The Russian government, through Acting Consul General Rayvid at Harbin, has presented to the foreign office of Manchukuo a demand for an explanation of the arrests and insists on prompt measures for the release of the prisoners.

"The arrests were made without documents, accompanied by searches of the apartments and offices of Soviet employees of the Chinese Eastern railway which have not been explained," Rayvid said.

The Japanese allege that some of the prisoners confessed to an attack on the Japanese military intelligence office at Suifenho (Pogranichnaya), to sending Manchurian and Corean communists into the territory, to wrecking trains carrying Japanese troops and munitions toward the frontier, and to creating general disturbances along the eastern line.

Probably before long will come the news that the Japanese have seized the Chinese Eastern railway, and that may very well result in war between Japan and Russia.

BY A vote of about 10 to 1 the people of Germany decided that Chancellor Adolf Hitler's action in assuming the powers of president was all right. The result of the plebiscite was: "Yes," 38,362,760; "No," 4,294,654; "Invalid," 872,296. Though the "yes" votes were several million less than in the November plebiscite on the withdrawal from the League of Nations, the Nazis are satisfied and Hitler appears to be safely fixed as the country's ruler for the rest of his life. His power, as chancellor-leader, is greater than that of any other dictator.

The commission suggested a survey of a state-owned site immediately north of the capitol. A request for federal funds was proposed for the project.

Delicacies for the Winter Menu

Preserving Season at Hand; Abundant Supply of Cheap Fruit.

Midsummer is a time looked forward to by the thrifty housewife, for with it comes the pleasant task of canning and preserving for the family's winter need of jams, jellies and preserves.

Market reports indicate a plentiful supply of pears, peaches, grapes and other delicious fruits.

Here are two tested and economical recipes:

Concord Grape Jelly.

4 cups (2 lbs.) juice
½ bottle of fruit pectin
7½ cups (3¼ lbs.) sugar

To prepare juice, stem about three pounds fully ripe grapes and crush thoroughly. Add one-half cup water, bring to a boil, cover, and simmer ten minutes. Place fruit in jelly cloth or bag and squeeze out juice. (If malagas or other tight-skinned grapes are used, the juice of one lemon should be added to prepared juice).

Measure sugar and juice into large saucepan and mix. Bring to a boil over hottest fire and at once add bottled fruit pectin, stirring constantly. Then bring to a full rolling boil and boil hard one-half minute. Remove from fire, skim, pour quickly. Paraffin hot jelly at once. Makes about 11 glasses (six fluid ounces each).

Ginger Pear Jam.
(Using crystallized ginger)

4 cups (2 lbs.) prepared fruit
¼ to 1 cup diced crystallized ginger
1 bottle fruit pectin
7½ cups (3¼ lbs.) sugar

To prepare fruit, peel, core and crush completely or grind about three pounds fully ripe pears. Dice about one-half pound crystallized ginger.

Measure sugar and prepared fruit, tightly packed, into large kettle. Add ginger, mix well, and bring to a full rolling boil over hottest fire. Stir constantly before and while boiling. Boil hard one minute. Remove from fire and stir in bottled fruit pectin. Then stir and skim by turns for just five minutes to cool slightly, to prevent floating fruit. Pour quickly. Paraffin hot jam at once. Makes about 11 glasses (six fluid ounces each). This product may take a week to reach a usable set.

Earthquake Prophet

Earthquakes give no warning of their approach, and the seismograph gives only an accurate record of the intensity and duration of the shock. But a Japanese professor, the late T. Omari, carried out a great deal of research work on a method that has now been perfected. He took hundreds of shock measurements at regular intervals in areas where the horizontal and vertical stresses due to earthquakes had accumulated for years. By this method he was able to predict the exact time and location of the next shock. Shortly before his death he warned a fishing community that their village would be wiped out within a few days. The place was evacuated and the shock arrived and demolished the place to the minute. Another method is to watch the movements of the Japanese catfish. When these are stirred into activity and rise to the surface, a serious earthquake is imminent.—Tit-Bits Magazine.

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a faculty position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer meets a young man, Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy. At the railroad station they meet Mrs. Denver, engaged as matron. At the school the group is struck by an air of mystery pervading the place. Gordon Haskell, proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne completes the Academy faculty. In a schoolroom Janet finds a group, which the teachers had supposed were scholars, are really highly artistic wax figures.

"Certainly we would be only too glad," Payne answered, quite sure that he spoke for all of them. "To have students eager for education smooths a teacher's road."

"Exactly. But there is one pupil of—of another class, Berenice Bracebridge, the youngest daughter of the late Dr. Jethro Bracebridge."

He paused impressively, as if the announcement must change their entire conception of the state of affairs in Lostland academy. "It is chiefly for her that this whole arrangement exists; I am her guardian and the sole trustee of the estate, and under the terms of her father's will she is to receive her education at Lostland academy until she comes into control of her own fortune at twenty-one. I have undertaken much of her education myself, with the aid of various governesses—to comply with the spirit of the will, if not the letter; but lately she has demanded certain subjects on which, I have no hesitancy in saying, I am not an authority.

"Now you see the reason for your high salaries. I couldn't really, could I, ask specialists on these subjects to bury themselves in these hills for the sake of one young girl—lovely and intelligent as she is? And, since you are in Lostland, I wanted the farmers' children to share the advantages which you are bringing to Berenice."

Janet felt acute remorse that she had so misjudged this man, who could throw open the doors of the old academy to boys and girls stranded on these hills. "I think that is most kind and generous of you."

He waved his hand to indicate that it did not signify. "You will not find Berenice difficult, though, of course, she has had very little of the usual life of young girls."

"May I ask a question, sir?"—this from Arthur.

"As many as you like."

"Are you a relative of Miss Bracebridge?"

"No; the fact is, I was the adopted son of Mrs. Henry Haskell, of California, and I took her name. When I was about twenty-seven my adopted mother became the second wife of Doctor Jethro Bracebridge and stepmother to his five children, of whom Berenice was the youngest and then four years old. I was an instructor in a western college, but my adopted mother's marriage led to my taking a position as teacher of foreign languages in this academy, which thirteen years ago was in a very flourishing condition—" He paused and looked about the circle with his keen, restless eyes.

"I—I presume there were then—a number of deaths?" Payne said.

"Yes, Doctor Bracebridge's long illness—and a number of deaths. Doctor Bracebridge did me the honor to rely on me, to trust me; hence," he smiled rather wearily, "this strange situation! A rather lonely girl to be educated in a great academy to comply with the terms of a rather singular will; though, of course, all wills are singular to some one. As trustee I do not receive enough to keep this great place in order—"

"But couldn't you turn it into what it was in the days of its glory?"

"No—there's an obstacle," he said stubbornly. He looked at his watch. "Well, any more questions?"

"Do your pupils ever study by moonlight, sir?"

He turned quite pale. "Oh, I'll explain that circumstance—very slight—very odd, yet it has held up the whole situation here. Not now. It's after nine, and I think I heard the day pupils coming in the side entrance. As they cannot pay much, they tend the vegetable garden in the summer; and two are told off to look after the two furnaces, and to bring coal up to the cook in winter.

"Now it is nine; and we begin work at nine," he continued. "You will take the study with the glass door, Miss Mercer; and Mr. Payne, you will turn down the hall on the right as you face the staircase; and the first door you come to will be your schoolroom; and next Mr. Fleming's. We have thirty pupils. Each of you will have ten for one hour; and teach three hours at a stretch. At noon you will have recreation until one; and the students a study hour. At one, lunch will be served here for the three of you. At two, the students, who have their lunch in another dining room, will begin three forty-five minute shifts of reciting back to you what you taught them in the morning; and you will give out tasks to be done in the evening in their homes; and by Berenice here. That will bring us to about 3:45 in the afternoon; or, allowing for inevitable delays, four o'clock; making about five teaching hours a day. From four o'clock on your time is your own."

"Where is the library?" asked Payne.

"Across the hall from here. I'll show you."

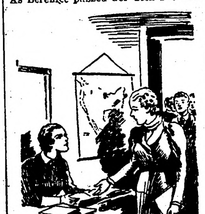
He led the way to a room which Janet thought gloomy in the extreme; but it was well stocked with books, which Payne examined eagerly. Then they went to their respective classrooms.

In hers, Janet found a number of boys and girls at the clumsy desks, and among them the girl she was most eager to behold—Berenice Bracebridge—who would, Janet thought, have arrested anyone's attention anywhere by her singular type of beauty. She seemed to be of those who look proudly out on life—but are not proud; a slender, aloof creature. Her features—where had Janet seen before the short upper lip, the thick lashes, the delicate skin, the abundant fair hair, the eyes with their expression of wanting to understand something which they could not understand? She rose gracefully as Janet entered, and looked about on her fellow students. They seemed to be nice boys and girls; and they rose rather uncertainly, following Miss Bracebridge's example.

"I think we're all here—and we are very glad to see you," she said half shyly.

Janet was unaccountably nervous, and she felt a certain uneasiness in her pupils. Their eyes wandered to the corridor, even when she was sure they were most attentive. In a rather shaky voice she opened her subject, a kind of prologue of the glories of English literature from Chaucer down.

The hour came to an end quickly. As Berenice passed her desk she held out her hand. "Thank you! You made things live. It's good to make things live."



"It's Good to Make Things Live."

Janet felt relieved, grateful, almost happy again. She left her platform and went to raise a window higher. When she returned other pupils were entering the room, and on her desk lay a folded note addressed simply "The Teacher." She slipped it into her bag, for Gordon Haskell was approaching in his quiet, quick way which reminded her of a leopard's movements. His sleek, shining hair, his dark eyes, and rather elongated rounded nose emphasized his appearance.

"Well, how did you get along?"

"Very well—thank you!"

"I am glad you are not nervous. Some of my governesses have been—very nervous."

His face had a cruel expression; and she recalled an old painting she had once seen of the burning of a witch in Salem, and of the pale, intense Puritan countenances lit up by the flames of the bonfire in the midst of which a woman writhed. The thought crossed her mind that she would be glad when Berenice ceased to be the ward of this man.

Meanwhile the object of this wish sat in the third schoolroom and listened to Wilton Payne's introduction of his subject. He had been expecting her all the morning, but she did not come until the third hour; a radiant creature, he thought, in her rather gay little mountain suit of copper-colored corduroy, the coat worn over a plain white silk blouse. Her serious young face recalled to his mind faces he had seen on canvases, in the National gallery: adorably delicate, almost whimsical in expression yet with a kind of sadness when the features were in repose.

She spoke at last—asked him some simple question. Her voice thrilled him, and its quality brought to him many memories, as the spiritual essence of a sound or a fragrance can always do. He had not heard such a voice outside of Europe, and then only echoes of it—the soprano notes of singing boys, gondoliers in Venice—the gentle voices of girls going like a flock of white doves to their first communion.

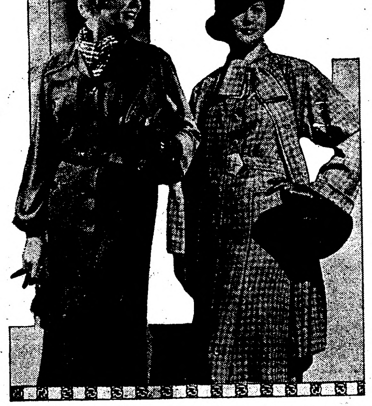
Excavations at Pompeii

Pompeii was buried under lava from an eruption of Mount Vesuvius more than 2,000 years ago. It was the most beautiful city in Italy. From the ruins scientists have learned much of ancient civilization. Archeological expeditions from almost every country have visited the site of Pompeii, but in recent years the most extensive excavations have been carried on under auspices of the Italian government.

Rich Fabric's the Thing for Fall

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



ADVANCE fall fashions cause one to think in terms of handsome materials, for it is fine fabrics, we're telling you, which will be making fine costumes this season.

The scheme of things for the new style program runs about like this—a strikingly simple silhouette, with emphasis on the elegance and unusualness of the material which fashions it, relying on breathtaking neckwear sets, buttons, buckles and countless other unique gadgets to dramatize the whole.

The big buttons which adorn the newly arrived frocks and wraps so spectacularly are of eye-filling proportions, some of them being simply enormous. It is such bizarre details as these huge buttons which add unlimited swank and distinction to the otherwise modestly styled fall modes.

It does not take long after catching a glimpse of the midseason and early fall styles to realize how strong buttons are going, in the new showings. For example, consider the very good-looking town and country dress to the left in the picture. Buttons all over it! The shirtwaist dress of which this model is a striking exponent, that is styled like a coat with buttons from neckline to hemline down the front and on the pockets, likewise the cuffs, is regarded as one of the most important numbers on the fall fashion program.

It is self-evident that this spectacular use of big buttons does a lot to distinguish this dress, but when it comes to keying enthusiasm to even a higher note, it is the intriguing material which fashions this dress which does just that. This fabric is an entirely new bemberg and wool weave in a radiant brown which is enlivened with a delicate interweaving of glossy yellow-and-gold threads. For daytime and sports you are going to find this bemberg and wool weave the very sort you are looking for.

That big news in regard to the ensemble pictured to the right is its color. The smart checked woolen of which it is made is in tones of green, and green this autumn is scheduled to make a front-stage play. That the dress which is topped with a stunning matched coat, like its companion in the illustration, should show a shirtwaist tendency is not a mere happenstance but rather a natural sequence of events for the shirtwaist idea which prevailed so conspicuously all summer is carrying over into fall with a high and mighty gesture. A brown fabric bag and brown felt slouch hat, go well with this two-tone green check.

There is nothing smarter for immediate wear than a shirtwaist dress of some one or other of the newer lightweight woolens. If the material reflects the glint and gleam of gold and silver, so much the better, for it is the metal-shot fabrics which are getting most of the notice for fall and winter. One way of interpreting the metal note is to see to it that your scarf or your neckpiece and other decorative accessories be fashioned of a metal-touched weave.

We would like to tell you in conclusion that there is a new canton crepe in the market. It works up very happily into practical street costumes.

TRIMMINGS FEATURE FALL SHOE STYLES

There are frills and thrills for the feet—if seeing is believing.

Afternoon dresses of marvelously colored prints are all arustle with frills and ruchings, large and small. Some are of the frock itself, while others stand out in crisp white contrast around both the neckline and the cuffs.

And the new shoes are not to be outdone. They, too, repeat this ruffled theme. The just-out blue and brown kidskin shoes have little butterfly bows, odd trimmings lined with white and knotted coils of stitched and pleated kidskin tabs.

Leather flowers are doing their smart duty several places, too—on plain kidskin pumps, either at the side or in front, and trimming leather and fabric purses, belts, hats and the gauntlet cuffs of gloves.

Some leather bracelets and clips are trimmed with metal and some are even set with stones while others are content to ornament themselves with knots of leather or bits of bead, glass, or straw.

Black Hose to Return to Fashion for Autumn Wear

The latest cry of the fashion prophets is black stockings; not gun-metal ones or bluish-black ones, but plain, ordinary, old-fashioned black stockings.

It's a wild gamble, betting on black stockings, when one remembers how often and how uselessly the very same fashion prophets have heralded the return of curves and long hair.

Black stockings have at least one worthwhile virtue. They make plump ankles and fat legs look slimmer. But it must be admitted they have a strong tendency to make skinny legs look like soda straws.

Picture Hats

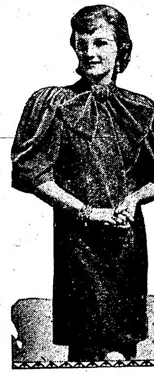
The first velvet picture hats have made their appearance at Chantilly, France. Some of them have crowns of sheer tulle or lace.

Cool Shoes

White buckskin shoes with diamond perforations are chic and cool for summer wear.

COLORFUL VELVET

By CHERIE NICHOLAS



The new velvets are conveying a message of color as gay and exotic as ever a rainbow reflected. As the season progresses your eye will be gladdened with such glorified hues as fuchsia, nasturtium, lime green and the new inkberry which is a rich plum tone. Feminine and flattering in color and styling is the wrap of powder blue transparent velvet here pictured. The scarf collar ties in a knot and the elbow sleeves are voluminously full.

Pleated Skirts Popular for All Ages for Fall

Pleated skirts will be important in early fall fashions, according to a stylist, who returned recently from Paris. This also speaks with enthusiasm of velvet bows that are used to trim both daytime and evening dresses, explaining that bows in different colors are substituted to give a change in appearance to the frock.

In Spirit of the Old West

Juvenile Rodeo Makes a Distinct Hit With Colorado Youngsters; Characterized as Splendid Idea for Letting Off Youthful Steam.

Substitution of an old-time Wild West rodeo with additional new and novel features for the traditional football season may become the fashion if other secondary schools follow the example set by the Cheyenne Mountain school at Colorado Springs, Colo. Reports describing the event indicate that the spectators were thrilled by the live-stock performance at least as much as they would have been by the game played with the dead pigskin.

Descriptions of the event in the local press show that it was a colorful day at the school grounds, and that with such an auspicious start it might well be possible to continue with this sport as a permanent substitute for football.

At the rodeo which was held recently at Colorado Springs, every child appeared in cowboy or cowgirl costume. A fifteen-piece baby drum and bugle corps played during the entire event. But, according to local accounts, the leader had a difficult time keeping the corps together, so interested were they in the more vigorous events.

The rodeo began at two in the afternoon with a parade led by the young queen of the day and two color-bearers. Behind them rode the broncho-busters, the steer riders, bareback riders and other contestants. Next came smaller children on bicycles, with wooden horse heads fastened to the front of the wheels, and finally a legion of little children of the first and second grades on hobby-horses.

Dr. Lloyd Shaw, superintendent of the school, in cowboy hat and high-heeled boots, made the announcements. All the events took place within a large circular corral fence, which had been built of railroad ties and stout poles. Outside were parked about 200 automobiles, from which spectators watched the show.

One of the new sports introduced at the rodeo was "steer decorating," which is a contest to see which performer can most quickly attach a rubber tip bearing ribbons to one of a steer's horns. The rest of the program included, besides the parade, calf riding, yearling steer riding for grade-school boys, steer riding for high-school boys, bucking horses, bareback riding, steer decorating, wild burro races, calf roping, saddle changing races, jumping, bike horse-races for grade-school boys, and a hobby-horse race for primary boys.

The idea for a juvenile rodeo of this kind occurred to Lloyd Shaw, superintendent of the Cheyenne Mountain school, who wanted to adapt this old western sport to the sports program of a modern school. "Not the exhibition, however, but the boy or girl is what we are really interested in," declared Mr. Shaw, whose feeling is that any youngster can still be thrilled by broncho-busting, steer riding, burro races, calf roping, and such features as made up rodeos of days gone by. That his contention is correct is borne out by the Colorado Springs Gazette and Telegraph, which called it "the most extraordinary event ever devised by an educator for the letting off of youthful steam."—Literary Digest.

Lunenburg Center of Vast Fishing Industry

Lunenburg, one of the most picturesque of Nova Scotia communities, is situated on the so-called South Shore of the province. It is second oldest town in the province, and is replete in historic interest.

The community was founded in 1753 by Germans and Swiss, and was named after the town of Lunenburg in Hanover, Germany. It has one of the finest harbors in Canada and is the headquarters of one of the world's greatest deep-sea fishing fleets—a million-dollar industry.

In its earlier days the fisheries of Lunenburg were confined to Labrador and alongshore. In 1865 Grand Banks, with deep-sea fishing, was included, and inside of 30 years this industry has grown from one or two vessels to more than 150, with aggregate crews of nearly 3,000. These Lunenburg fishing schooners, as typified by the famous Bluenose, recently at the Chicago Fair, represent the finest of marine architecture.

Bees Travel Far in Ice

Eleven and a half million bees, surrounded by ice packed in sawdust in bags, have just made a journey of 400 miles in a van. This experiment was successfully tried by Mr. W. S. Abram, a New South Wales beekeeper. The bees were in about 250 hives, and their long journey was necessary because there had been a failure of blossom in their neighborhood. Mr. Abram was faced with the alternative of feeding the bees artificially at a cost of $100 a week or of losing quantities of them through overheating while on transit to a place where they could find a new nectar supply. Ice solved his problem, and the bees arrived in excellent condition.

How often have you seen people who are about to sit down have the chair pulled out from under them? This and many other so-called practical jokes have often ended tragically. There is absolutely no excuse for this kind of joking and people should not tolerate it. Some very serious accidents have resulted because of this. They can be avoided.

From the Holt Weekly News for Sept. 11, 1914

Tires were being sold at "Before-War Prices" as follows: 30x3, $11.70; 30x3½, $15.75; 34x4, $24.35, etc. "Now inferior grades cost double," the ad. read. "It is folly to pay more." One would almost think so.

The Holt school was scheduled to open Sept. 14 with Misses Cora Hanson and Dagny Bakke as teachers. The upper grades, taught by Miss Hanson, were in the old schoolhouse southwest of town, while the lower grades were in the Woodman Hall.

Homestead entries were made by Chris Yttri, Ernest Pechie, Johanna M. Nelson, and Olga C. Larson.

Views and Reviews

[The views below do not necessarily coincide with the official beliefs of this publication; they are merely personal observations.]

It is quite well known throughout Minnesota that ever since Governor Floyd B. Olson's first term of office there has been widespread and growing dissatisfaction with his appointments to head the various departments of state.

As the public are in no doubt aware, through newspaper reports, this dissatisfaction has crystallized into definate, articulate political action, and so emphatic and determined has this feeling become that it was only necessary to provide an opportunity for its expression.

The opportunity came on Labor Day, when many hundreds of the charter members of the old Nonpartisan League and and Farmer-Labor party met at Benson, determined to impress upon the Governor their grievance. The convention selected a committee of 100 delegates, to wait on Governor Olson, with the request that he correct several of the most flagrant abuses of his appointive power. When the committee appeared before the Governor and made this demand it was none too courteously received. Townley announced he would be a candidate for governor if Governor Olson refused to accede to the demands of the committee. The Governor refused.

The Committee of 100 will meet Sunday afternoon September 16, at St. Cloud to consider the reply of Governor Olson, and to decide their course. Will Townley file for governor? The next few days will tell.

Celebrated 25th Anniversary

A large crowd of friends and relatives of Mr and Mrs. O. H. Nohre gathered at their home on Sunday to celebrate their 25th wedding anniversary. A very nice program had been arranged for the occassion. The Holt Community Band under the leadership of Rev. Rev. Redal, opened the program by playing several selections.

Mr. P. P. Reierson of Thief River Falls, Supt. E. O. Nybakken and County Attorney W. O. Braggans of Warren gave talks on married life and congratulated the honored couple upon their having successfully sailed the sea of matrimony for a quarter century. A ladies chorus sang several songs and dedicated one each to the honored couple.

Mr. and Mrs. Nohre have always taken an active part in church and social work and also did their part in all other activities in the community since they came here from Spring Grove, Minn. about twenty years ago.

The honored couple was given a cash purse of fifty dollars as a remembrance of the occassion.

A delicious lunch was served to all after the program and the rest of the day was spent visiting. The news joins their many friends and relatives here in wishing them many more years of happiness.

Holt Had First Fire In 1934

The village fire bell had the dust hammered off of it on Friday evening for the first time in 1934 as far as we know. The barn owned by Guy Anderson located in the north end of town burned down and the fire department was called out in rush order.

The fire, which had a big start before it was discovered, nearly got away with the whole neighborhood. The wood shed on the Andrew Bjerk property was almost destroyed by fire and partly torn down.

The fire department was a little late in getting to their post and when they did get going the lights went out. This was caused by a short circuit when the high line wires fell from a pole near the barn. The department got the old Rumley started and poured on the water so as to save other buildings from going the same way as there was quite a wind chasing sparks around.

No one knows how the fire started.

Taking everything into consideration (everything) they all did their best. We say the same as a cafe owner in a small town in North Dakota told a lady who came into the cafe at midnight and asked for fried chicken. His answer was, "This is no city."

Advice of Inspectors

Quality is a very important factor in the production of cream, with inspectors inspecting all butter that comes on the market, for foreign matter such as flies and other things that may get into the cream, which may result in a total loss of some churnings. Let's all work hand in hand to prevent such happenings.

Chicken Season Opens Sunday

All upland game shooting in Minnesota will be limited to half days only with nine half days of hunting prairie chickens being scheduled for Marshall and 12 other Northern Minnesota counties, according to rules adopted by the Minnesota Conservation Commission in St. Paul.

There will also be an open season for pheasants in 71 Minnesota counties, the entire Northwestern part of Minnesota being excluded, including Marshall, Polk, Pennington, Kittson, Red Lake, Roseau and Clearwater counties.

On recommendation of Commissioner Ernest R. Reiff the commission decided that all upland game shooting be restricted to half days only, from noon until sunset.

The commission also decided to coordinate all upland game shooting with the exception of prairie chickens which the law provides may be taken between September 16 and October 1.

The commission ordered half-day shooting for nine days on prairie chickens, restricted to 13 northern Minnesota counties, including Marshall, starting at noon September 16 and ending at sunset September 24. The bag limit was fixed at six per day with 12 in possesion.

The bag limit is the same as last year, and is less than the law permits. Under the law nine daily may be taken with 18 in possession.

Counties in which the prairie chickens may be taken are St. Louis, Itasca, Koochiching, Lake of the Woods, Beltrami, Clearwater, Mahnomen, Polk, Red Lake, Pennington, Marshall, Roseau and Kittson.

The season on pheasants was opened by the commission in 71 counties, starting at noon Oct. 20 and extending for 16 half days in all but seven counties where the season is nine half days.

No hens will be permitted to be taken this year, it was decided on the advice of Erling Swenson, state game and fish commissioner. Last year 2cocks and one hen were permitted. This year three cocks will be pe permitted, with six in possession and not over 18 for the season.

The nearest counties in which local hunters can go for pheasant hunting is in Norman or Clay counties.

Frank Hoffman, Farmer living two miles south of town, is this week advertising all his farm equipment livestock and household goods for sale at public auction to be held next Friday, Sept., 21. Read the ad on the back page.

Trade In Sale! Nothing like it ever before—Any old radio is worth $20.00—Bicycle $10.00—Washer $15.00—Auto Batteries $2.00—Coaster Wagon $1.00 and scores of other worn out items will bring equal value at Gambles, beginning Sept. 14th to 29th. Sam Lorentson, owner.

A crowd estimated to number about a thousand people attended the Sam Kytola sale northeast of town Tuesday.

Mrs. Henry Nohre is at the Physician's hospital in Thief River Falls where she is taking treatment for bloodpoison in her right hand.

Several carloads of hay and grain have been loaded out from here the past week.

Will Make "Sticker" Drive

Acceding to demands prevailed upon him from every section of Marshall county with promised support from many volunteer workers, Sheriff Hans C. Hanson has announced that he would enter the fall campaign as a "sticker" candidate for the office of Marshall county sheriff.

When Mr. Hanson received his appointment recently by the county board of commissioners to succeed the late John P. Bordewich, he announced that he had no intentions of entering the race. However, since the announcement, hundreds of his friends from every part of the county have beseiged Mr. Hanson to make the race and offered him their wholehearted support.

The announcement that a "sticker" campaign will be made for the Sheriff's office will add considerable interest to the fall campaign, this being the first campaign of this nature in mordern times in Marshall county. The Minnesota election laws provide that only two names can go on the general election ballot, these two being selected at the primary election in June.

Mr. Bordewich's unexpected death brought a quick change in the sheriff's political race with O. C. Toftner of Warren being moved into top position and with Evald E. Erickson of near Argyle, who was third in the primary race being automatically raised to a place on the fall ballot.

Mr. Hanson was sheriff of Marshall county from 1915 to 1926, serving 12 years in the office. He retired voluntarily in 1926 to resume his farming operations near Viking. During the past few years he has operated a grocery store in Viking in addition to his farming operations.—Warren Sheaf.

The Reason Why - -

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

SENATOR T. D. SCHALL'S HARSH LANGUAGE TO PRESIDENT—TEXTILE STRIKE ORDERED.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© Western Newspaper Union.

Senator Schall

SENATOR THOMAS D. SCHALL of Minnesota, Republican, engaged in an acrimonious controversy with President Roosevelt concerning the former's assertion that the administration is seeking to curb the press, and the blind senator used language that was so disrespectful to the Chief Executive that even Mr. Roosevelt's severest critics could not approve of it. The President had asked Mr. Schall for the "facts" on which he based his recent assertion that plans are under consideration for "a national press service to take the place of the Associated Press, the Hearst News service and the United Press." This service, Mr. Schall said, would "have exclusive use of all government news and be in a position to give its service only to those newspapers loyal to the Roosevelt dictatorship."

"Once these facts are in my hands," said Mr. Roosevelt, "they will receive immediate attention in order to make impossible the things you say will be done, because I am just as much opposed to them as you are."

The senator immediately sent to the President and made public a 650 word letter in which he said in part:

"You ask me for 'information' concerning what you yourself have done. Are you attempting to secure the facts so that you may be in a position to refute yourself?

"Your telegram to me bears out the suggestion of the constant effort to mislead and fool the public. Your desire to make yourself appear before the people of the United States as champion of a free press may be as insincere as your promises to the people when you accepted the Democratic nomination at Chicago with the statement that you were for their platform 100 per cent.

"To date you have not kept one of the covenants you pledged the people at that time. Let me recall your testy anger at your disappointment in keeping out of the press code the expression of a free press."

Schall went on to cite what he called "specific evidence" of an intention by the President to force a censorship of the press so that "your acts and the acts of your Communistic bureaucrats might be hidden from public gaze."

Mr. Roosevelt sent the senator an answer sharply rebuking him for his "vituperative" letter "which gives no facts and does not answer my simple request." In conclusion he said: "The incident is closed."

Schall retorted in somewhat milder language that he as a representative of the people could not let the affair rest, and reiterated his charges of press censorship in the government departments.

FRANCIS J. GORMAN, head of the strike committee of the United Textile Workers, sent to the sectional leaders the secret instructions for a general walk-out in the cotton textile industry on September 4. The order affects approximately 500,000 cotton mill workers; and about 300,000 more will go on strike then or soon after in the silk, rayon and woolen mills.

"I am fully convinced," Gorman told reporters, "that the strike not only will materialize but will be successful."

The administration, however, still hoped that the strike could be averted through the efforts of the national labor relations board headed by Lloyd Garrison. The union leaders have made it plain that they expect the strike will be indirectly financed by the government through the relief organizations. They admit that their unions have not sufficient funds to carry the workers through the prospective period of idleness.

There are reports that the cotton mill owners are not especially eager to have the walkout prevented, since their surplus of manufactured goods is still large.

HARRY HOPKINS, administrator of federal emergency relief, returned from his trip through England, France, Germany, Austria and Italy, which he said had given him many new ideas on work, relief, housing and unemployment insurance. From these ideas he evolved a plan for "permanent relief for all and unemployment for none," and this he laid before President Roosevelt. He did not make public the details, but indicated the plan contemplates public works on a bigger scale and unemployment insurance based on an American system that will not go bankrupt as did the European reserves.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S executive committee submitted, through its secretary, Donald Richberg, its first report on the accomplishments of the administration. After citing figures to show the extent of business improvement, the report added:

"The coincidence of business improvement with the NRA codification and the obvious, direct effects of NRA in preventing destructive price cutting, in stabilizing business operations, in improving the total purchasing power by providing increased employment without reduction of compensation, and in the increase of prices from loss levels to profit levels, demonstrate the dominant influence of the NRA in this industrial advance."

The council estimated that "total wages in manufacturing industries increased from $96,000,000 a week in June, 1933, to $132,000,000 a week in June, 1934, or 37.5 per cent. When this increase of 37.5 per cent is compared with an increased living cost of 9.6 per cent," the report said, "there remains despite increased cost of living a net increase of 25 per cent in the total purchasing power of manufacturing wage earners." The average increase of per capita weekly earnings was found to be only 8.5 per cent.

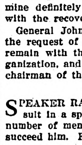
COTTON garment code amendments reducing the working hours and giving workers a wage increase have been signed by the President. The amendments, which affect plants in 42 states, are of far-reaching importance.

Sidney Hillman, labor advisory board member and Amalgamated Clothing union head, termed signing of the order "the most far-reaching move NRA has yet made to increase employment." It was hoped that this order would avert the threatened strike of the garment workers.

RETURNING from his swift trip to attend the funeral of Mr. Rainey, the President went directly back to Washington instead of going to his Hyde Park home. This change in plan was due, it was said, to the development of a bitter dispute between Gen. Hugh S. Johnson on one side and Donald Richberg, Mr. Roosevelt's chief industrial adviser, and Secretary of Labor Perkins on the other, over the new structure to be given the NRA.

The issue, it was disclosed, is whether there shall be a board of control in authoritative management of the NRA or a board which shall be more advisory in power, leaving the real control still in the hands of the administrator and his deputies. It was expected Mr. Roosevelt would take command of the situation and determine definitely what shall be done with the recovery administration.

General Johnson has said that, at the request of the President, he will remain with the NRA after its reorganization, and presumably he will be chairman of the board.



Joseph W. Byrns

SPEAKER RAINEY'S death will result in a spirited contest among a number of men who are ambitious to succeed him. First in the line of succession, so to speak, is Representative Joseph W. Byrns of Tennessee, who has been serving as majority floor leader and who is head of the Democratic national congressional committee. President Roosevelt is going to take no part in the race, but the more liberal of the New Dealers are known to favor Sam Rayburn of Texas. Well informed observers believe Byrns will be elected speaker and Rayburn floor leader. Other aspirants for the speakership are John E. Rankin of Mississippi, who has announced his candidacy; William B. Bankhead of Alabama, and John J. O'Connor of New York.

Mr. Byrns has been a member of the house continuously since his election to the Sixty-first congress. His work as floor leader, in conjunction with Rainey's rule as speaker, was not especially pleasing to the New Dealers for some months during the last session, but before adjournment most of the misunderstandings were cleared up. In any case, the administration seldom interferes in the selection of the leaders of congress, not wishing to incur the enmity of powerful members of the party.

ORGANIZED labor scored a victory over Recovery Administrator Johnson when the national labor relations board ordered John Donovan, former president of the NRA union, dismissed by Johnson for "inefficiency," reinstated to his position with the labor advisory board.

"The agencies which are administering the law should in their own dealings uphold its purposes," the board said in its decision, giving a veiled reproof to Johnson for what it implied was a violation of section 7A of the NRA.

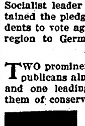
With rather bad grace the NRA accepted the rebuke and permitted Donovan to return to his job. Johnson himself had nothing to say about it, but Dr. Gustav Peck, Donovan's immediate superior, issued a statement in which he sniffed at the board's decision and warned Donovan that he would have to "toe the mark."

Soon after this the NRA announced that it does not regard itself as obliged to withdraw the Blue Eagle in cases where the national labor relations board has found companies guilty of violation of section 7A of the national industrial recovery act and of subsequent failure to obey the instructions of the board.

The labor board has recommended withdrawal of the Blue Eagle to the NRA compliance board in all cases where companies have disobeyed its instructions to reinstate discharged employees. The decision by the NRA will remove teeth from decisions by the board, since it may now hear cases, make decisions, and find that no penalties are inflicted for disobeying its orders.

CHANCELLOR HITLER of Germany, speaking at Fortress Ehrenbreitstein, held out the hand of friendship to France, offering peaceful cooperation after the settlement of the Saar problem which, he said, was "the last territorial difference separating Germany and France." He gave eloquent expression to Germany's alleged desire for peace and reconciliation.

The chancellor predicted the Saar would be restored to Germany by the plebiscite that is to be held on January 13. In this he may be deceiving himself, for recent dispatches say a Socialist leader named Braun has obtained the pledges of 70,000 Saar residents to vote against the return of the region to Germany.



Jouett Shouse

TWO prominent Democrats, two Republicans almost equally prominent, and one leading industrialist, all of them of conservative tendencies, have united to organize the American Liberty league dedicated to a war on radicalism in the United States. The five founders of the league are: Alfred E. Smith, Democratic Presidential candidate in 1928; John W. Davis, Democratic Presidential candidate in 1924; Nathan L. Miller, Republican ex-governor of New York; James W. Wadsworth, Republican congressman from New York, former senator and Presidential possibility for 1936; and Irenee Du Pont, manufacturer, who supported Smith in 1928 and Roosevelt in 1932. They believe the league membership will grow into the millions and that it will become an important element in the national life.

For president of the organization the founders selected Jouett Shouse, former chairman of the Democratic national committee and president of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment until repeal was accomplished. In a statement Mr. Shouse set for the purposes of the league as follows:

"It is a nonpartisan organization, formed, as stated in its charter, 'to defend and uphold the Constitution of the United States and to gather and disseminate information that (1) will teach the necessity of respect for the rights of persons and property as fundamental to every successful form of government, and (2) will teach the duty of government to encourage and protect individual and group initiative and enterprise, to foster the right to work, earn, save, and acquire property, and to preserve the ownership and lawful use of property when acquired.'"

To interviewers Mr. Shouse declared the league was not anti-Roosevelt, but it seemed clear that it will be opposed to most of the major purposes of the New Deal and the radical professors of the brain trust. He said he had visited the President and informed him fully of the purposes of the league, but he would not tell what Mr. Roosevelt's reaction had been.

LIEUT. COL. MARIO HERNANDEZ organized a plot to overthrow the government of President Mendieta of Cuba and establish a military dictatorship, but the authorities got wind of it and frustrated the conspiracy, in which a considerable part of the army was involved. Col. Fulgencio Batista, head of the army, said that Major Benitez and some soldiers were sent to arrest Hernandez and that eight men of the detachment were killed. Hernandez tried to shoot Benitez but was himself shot in the head and neck. The official report said Hernandez was being rushed toward Havana in an automobile and that the car upset, the prisoner being killed, though the others in the car were uninjured.

Maj. Angel Echevarria, commandant of Fourth infantry at Camp Columbia, and Capt. Augustin Erice, chief of the signal corps, conspirators with Hernandez, were captured later and a summary court-martial sentenced them to death.

Four thousand troops in Pinar del Rio are confined to barracks, under arrest, and a thorough reorganization of the entire high command of the Cuban army is in full swing. About 200 civilians have also been arrested as parties to the conspiracy, charged with carrying messages to other military plotters in Matanzas and Camaguey provinces.

EIGHTY-EIGHT Soviet citizens are now under arrest in Manchukuo, charged with plotting against Manchukuo and Japan and sabotaging Japanese military trains. The Russian government, through Acting Consul General Rayvid at Harbin, has presented to the foreign office of Manchukuo a demand for an explanation of the arrests and insists on prompt measures for the release of the prisoners.

"The arrests were made without documents, accompanied by searches of the apartments and office of Soviet employees of the Chinese Eastern railway which have not been explained," Rayvid said.

The Japanese allege that some of the prisoners confessed to an attack on the Japanese military intelligence office at Suifenho (Pogranichnaya) to sending Manchurian and Corean communists into the territory, to wrecking trains carrying Japanese troops and munitions toward the frontier, and to creating general disturbances along the eastern line.

Probably before long will come the news that the Japanese have seized the Chinese Eastern railway, and that may very well result in war between Japan and Russia

Scraps of Humor

BELIEVE IT, OR NOT

A dear old lady was shocked at the lurid language of two electricians who were working in her house, and complained to the company. In due course the two men were sent for and asked for an explanation.

"Why?"

"It isn't good enough, dear."

Prof. Albert Einstein gave recently what he considered the best formula for success in life. I should say the formula is a equals x plus y plus z, x being work and y being play."

"And what is z?" inquired the interviewer.

"That," he answered, "is keeping your mouth shut."

EXPERT SUMS UP FORMIDABLE LIST OF EYE DEFECTS

Many a driver who sees clearly, so far as he is aware, and who pays attention to the road still finds driving a car hazardous business. Such a man will be interested in what Dr. Alvah R. Lauer, of Iowa State college, says about the physical shortcomings of apparently normal people.

Clarity of vision is merely one of the qualities of normal eyesight. A secondary quality is width of the field of vision. Normally, a person looking straight ahead detects the presence of a car when it pulls up beside him, but some do not become aware of it until it moves ahead. Extreme sufferers from narrow vision are said to possess tunnel vision, but many persons have less than the normal field of 185 to 195 degrees and do not suspect the fact.

Depth of vision also is necessary to safe driving. This means that the man behind the wheel must not only be able to see a car in the road but must be aware of whether it is traveling with him, standing still, or coming toward him, and approximately how fast. Depth perception is linked with another point, eye dominance. Many people who get headaches when they are tired do so because they are seeing out of only one eye, although they do not know it. Two eyes are needed for three-dimension sight.

Color blindness is a common and widely recognized fault. Another thing needed for safe driving is strength in the hands for emergency use; there must also be the ability to judge speed of movement, and the right amount of awareness to sudden noise. All these and many other abilities are part of every person's makeup in varying degrees. We recognize them by saying a driver is alert, or capable, observant, quick, cool, but seldom think to discover which particular combintaions of perception and nervous control produce these desirable qualities. It goes without saying, however, that a driver who recognizes his deficiencies can take steps to compensate for them.—Detroit Free Press.

American Tories

St. John, New Brunswick, known as the City of the Loyalists, received more than 10,000 persons who left the United States at the close of the Revolution because they had decided to remain loyal to the British king. On April 16, 1783, 3,000 Loyalists landed in St. John from New York, and Boston.

In the first 3,000 were many hundred residents of Boston who fled from that city to New York and placed themselves under the protection of Sir Guy Carleton, commander of the British forces in the New York area.

Living in New Brunswick now are thousands of descendants of the Boston Loyalists, and there are many in New England who have become American citizens.

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a faculty position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer meets a young man, Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy. At the railroad station they meet Mrs. Denver, engaged as matron. At the school the group is struck by an air of mystery pervading the place. Gordon Haskell, proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne completes the Academy faculty. In a schoolroom Janet finds a group, which the teachers had supposed were scholars, are really highly artistic wax figures. Haskell explains the unusual circumstances connected with the conduct of the Academy. Among the pupils is Berenice Bracebridge, daughter of the late owner of the school.

He began to speak of psychology in an introductory way, his mind still in foreign countries. "And you understand," he said after some preliminary explanations, "that it must always be a relative subject; for the human imagination is plastic, takes impressions from places. The incalculable sadness of pine-hemmed Ravenna with its lost churches and forgotten graves might well enchant Lord Byron but leave the fever-ridden peasant only with a great weariness of marshes from which he could not escape. The old, old half lights of London with the fog rolling in from the Thames, and the black bubble of St. Paul's riding airily—think of their influence on a mind like Charles Lamb's; or the sea eaves of Guernsey on Victor Hugo's, and the wind-swept gorgeous heights of Spain on the haughty personality of its grandees."

But he wanted to hear her voice again, and he asked the class questions for no other purpose than to hear her speak.

His heart beat rapidly with a new, enchanting excitement. He had worked so hard all his life that to turn aside into romance would have seemed as futile to him as an excursion into a lovely wood road would be to a traveler hastening to a city in which he had important business.

When the class was dismissed, and she had smiled a little as she passed him, he had sat for a long time staring at his papers and meditating over the desperate limitations of theory. The heart of the universe was a magic which could not be learned from books or weary young teachers, but directly from the bright lining of a cloud, frail, beautiful spring flowers, sunsets, or the profoundly sweet voice of one woman selected from all others by infallible instinct as the voice a man would wish to hear through all his living and at the moment of his dying. "What has got over me?" he said, and rose and put away his books.

In the corridor he met Arthur.

"How did you get on?"

"Very well—and you?"

"Miss Bracebridge rather led the psychology class—she is very pretty, very interesting, don't you think?"

"Not so pretty as Janet Mercer."

Payne breathed a sigh of relief. As if evoked by the words of her name, Janet was coming down the corridor.

"Isn't it quite thrilling to teach in such a school?"

"It is, indeed," Payne said fervently.

"I noticed something rather odd," Arthur began. "My pupils watched the corridor a good deal—kept looking toward the dark hall, and rather apprehensively. And I overheard a conversation between two of them as they were collecting their books. It ran something like this: 'Where does he keep the dummies?'

"'Balder told father they were in the basement.'

"'I bet you wouldn't go into the room where they are!'

"'I bet I would.'

"'Balder says he's afraid of them—she isn't!'

"'She ought to be afraid of 'em.'

"'She never knew 'em—she was only six.'

"Of course I pricked up my ears, but they saw I was listening in, and stopped. They're nice, hearty youngsters—rather hazy about their mathematical attainments."

"I am rather worried about Mrs. Denver," Janet said. "I went to her room again, but she is not there. I hope Mr. Haskell will not overwork her."

He was waiting for them in the lunch room, and his bright, restless eyes searched their faces keenly. "Ah, here you are! Alive, I see!"

The words were trivial, but they jarred upon Arthur. "Why shouldn't we be?"

"Well, I thought the strain of teaching under these rather novel conditions might be hard. Your pupils are most enthusiastic—you will go far with them."

Again the curious note in his voice. As the lunch proceeded the talk drifted to religion. "I often think," he said, "of the old idea that religion and politics must not be mentioned in society—whereas, as I heard a famous man say once, they are the only subjects worth talking about. There must be a religion that swallows up all others; and a policy that dominates all other policies of government. What an extraordinary privilege to be the initiator either of that religion or that policy!"

"Not being Olympians, I am afraid we will none of us have such a privilege."

The eyes of Gordon Haskell grew deep, subtle, secretive; and the flame of fanaticism lighted them. "It is not in cities such experiments in universality are tried out, but amid the violence of nature and in the haunted recesses of the hills. What is your conception of religion, Miss Mercer?"

"I think its essence is allurement, attraction, gentleness; going toward a flame because it warms you. There could be no cruelty, no violence, no bigotry in true religion," Janet ventured.

When lunch was finished, Haskell rose and stood like a brown shadow against the white door of the room. "One would give children an eternal playtime," he said wistfully. "But that they only have when they die. You will be free at four. In your walks you will observe that the east wing, once Doctor Bracebridge's family quarters, is guarded off by a high iron fence. I live there now, and Berenice and her old nurse have the top floor. It is not necessary to visit that part of the academy," he added significantly.

"I hope we may some day see Miss Bracebridge out of study hours," Payne said boldly. The simple words seemed to arouse Haskell's anger, but he said casually, "There's not the slightest objection—if she cares to see you."

To cover up Payne's silence, Janet asked: "May I see Mrs. Denver for a moment?"

"Certainly. If you will go to your room I will send her to you."

Five minutes later she came in—pale, amazed, utterly unlike the little, confident woman who had arrived at Blade. She gathered Janet into her arms hungrily. "Oh, my dear, what kind of a place are we in? I've had such a morning—heaps of linen—but not a soul have I seen. He has the ordering of the meals! He keeps the keys of everything."

"I was worried about you."

"And I about you. Oh, my dear, such gloomy kitchens!"

"Where are they?"

"In the basement at the east wing. He lives on the first floor; Miss Bracebridge and an old country woman named Martha on the top floor. Everything's very damp and dark and sad and silent. The cook's an old woman, the wife of the man who drove us up. The sulky young man assists her; and that great, tall creature is called Balder."

"Did you speak of the wax figures?"

"No, but I heard the young fellow say to the cook, 'The dummies is back again. Master was mad as a mad bull.'"

"Better not speak of them, Mrs. Denver. Now I must go back to the school room. It is almost two."

CHAPTER III

Four o'clock came quickly. At ten minutes after, Arthur was waiting for her in the hall. She had arrayed herself in a short tweed skirt, an orange jersey and knitted cap. "Now to explore this wild land."

As they walked through the crisp, clear air their normal spirits came back to them, and the moldering academy seemed like an oppressive dream. They made their way around the west wing and skirted the vegetable garden, which stretched toward a grove of oaks; beyond these they saw the gleaming waters of Midnight lake.

A small dock was found; and to one of its posts two rowboats with locked oars were tied. Both bore the lettering, "Property of the Academy."

"Shall we row across to the ravine side?"

"That would be the quickest way to reach the falls."

On the lake, quietly rowing, their perturbed spirits became stilled by the intense and wild loveliness of the scene. The scarred and ragged peaks were already taking on the heliotrope vapors and lights of evening, and the excessive beauty of the landscape was like the crash of an orchestra.

Arthur said little, only too thankful to be away with Janet Mercer—away from that sinister house.

"Look, there's an eagle." She pointed to the great bird winging its flight northward. "He doesn't have to teach in Lostland academy."

"Are you beginning to feel nervous again?"

"Yes—but I intend to put it through."

"Of course we'll put it through."

She liked the plural pronoun. He glanced at her, thinking her beauty was like some happy adventure of the spirit. He could not imagine her growing old or tired or discouraged. Always there would be the light touch, the smile over the irrevocable, the happy confidence of that rare minority who walk the world as if it were an enchanted place. She had dignity, too—that attribute rare in modern women.

"I am very lucky," he said abruptly.

"Aren't we really always in luck if we only knew it?"

"I wonder if Gordon Haskell is lucky."

"I am sure he wants to be. Were your scholars as exemplary as mine?"

"Ah, that reminds me. I have a note in my purse, addressed simply 'The Teacher.' I think this is a good time to read it."

She unfolded it and as she read it gave a little, startled gesture and passed the bit of paper to him. On it were the cryptic words, "Gordon Haskell is afraid of nothing but the four wax figures."

TO BE CONTINUED.

About Eagles

Lethal Talons of the American Bald Eagle.

Prepared by National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.—WNU Service.

EAGLES usually nest in out-of-the-way places. But recently two American eagles were discovered housekeeping only 30 miles from Baltimore. Accustomed to living in the vicinity of water, they selected a tall pine tree near the Magothy river as the site for an immense nest.

Building a huge structure of sticks at considerable height from the ground, several large white eggs were laid, and the two birds took turns remaining on the nest for the month's period of incubation. An enthusiastic ornithologist who scaled the tree numerous times was fortunate enough to observe the two young eaglets from the time they were hatched until they flew away eleven weeks later.

Eagles and their many relatives among the hawks and vultures are distributed throughout the world, except over the open seas, the barren Antarctic continent, and the smallest and most isolated of oceanic islands. Wherever found, they appeal even to the novice in knowledge of things outdoors because of their manner of life and predatory habits. Robust of form and strong in flight, they are remarked at every appearance.

The emblem of the Sumerian city of Lagash, in the third millennium before the Christian Era, was an eagle, which was engraved on the tablets and seals of the leaders and was carried as a military standard by the army. An eagle also appeared on the seal of the King of Ur, and continued in double-headed form in Hittite art, on certain coins of the Mohammedans, on the flags of Turkoman princes, and so on into modern times.

The eagle symbol is probably derived from forms similar to our golden eagles or closely allied to that species, as several species of that type are found in the regions mentioned.

Messenger of Zeus.

To early Greeks the eagle was the messenger of Zeus and the only bird that dwelt in heaven— a fancy based, perhaps, on the high-flying powers of these birds. A silver eagle standing on a spear was placed on the military standards of the legions of Rome, and this emblem has been used widely as a conventional badge of military power. Today it is a common decoration on flagstaffs in many countries.

An American species of this group, the bald eagle, is found in the design of the coat of arms of the United States, which appears on the Great Seal. A representation of it is blazoned on many of our coins and decorations. It also appears on the President's flag, and on the President's seal in the bronze plate on the floor of the vestibule of the White House.

The fierce harpy eagle, a bird of dauntless courage, called by the Aztecs "the winged wolf," is engraved on the official coat of arms and seal of Mexico and appears on the flag of that country. It is distinguishable from our species by its prominently crested head.

The eagles and their kin form the group of birds of the order of Falconiformes, which includes about 288 distinct species, with many additional geographic races, so that in all there are recognized somewhat more than 700 living forms. The order is divided into four principal families.

The eagles, hawks, kites, and their relatives, forming the family Accipitridae, include the largest number of forms. They are mainly birds of medium to large size, with broad wings, strong legs, feet armed with sharp claws, and strongly hooked bills. Many possess light-colored eyes, which, with their active interest in any movement that might indicate possible prey, give them a fierce and aggressive appearance.

Their Methods of Flight.

Flight in the hawklike birds varies considerably, according to the kind. Eagles, the large hawks, and the vultures, both of the New and Old Worlds, have broad wings which they flap slowly. Frequently they soar with set wings, utilizing air currents rising from the heated surface of the earth or currents generated by winds. These birds frequently soar for hours with scarcely a wing beat, turning and wheeling in the sky, often at such altitudes that they appear as mere specks against the blue.

The turkey vulture is a well-known species that is particularly adept in this art. In fact, it finds this method of progression so adapted to its needs that frequently it remains in its roost through the day when the air is heavy and still.

The falcons have longer, more pointed wings that enable them to fly with great speed, and, though they may enjoy soaring, they do not practice this so constantly as the other hawks. The larger species can capture the swiftest flying sandpipers and ducks on the wing without the slightest difficulty.

The food of birds of the hawk group is highly varied, though it is taken entirely from the animal kingdom. The larger species of falcons subsist mainly on various kinds of birds and small mammals, but the smaller kinds, such as sparrow hawks and falconets, eat lizzards, grasshoppers and other insects, and mice. The bearded vultures of the Old World are said to carry turtles and large bones from the carcasses of dead animals to a great height, in order to drop them on rocks, where they break open so that the bird can eat the marrow.

Some species of hawks, particularly certain forms that range in the Tropics, eat snakes as their principal food. There is one group of species found in India and adjacent regions in which this habit is so constant that the birds are known as "serpent eagles." The osprey and some of the sea eagles confine their attention mainly to fish, which they capture alive by plunging after them as they approach the surface of the water. The powerful harpy eagle feeds regularly on monkeys.

The golden eagle, one of the most powerful of American birds of prey, has a varied menu. Where prairie dogs are present in large numbers, these are favored food; a pair of eagles will destroy several hundred in the course of a season. At times they turn to sharp-tailed grouse when these are abundant, proving a scourge to the flocks. Jack rabbits, cottontails, marmots, and ground squirrels are killed in large numbers. In winter, when other food is scarce, they may come to dead carcasses, being sometimes hard put in severe weather when the meat is frozen, even with the great strength that they possess in bill and feet.

They also attack lambs and fawns on occasion, and one observer records that three golden eagles working together pulled down and killed a pronghorn antelope during severe winter weather when other food was scarce. They will kill and eat coyotes caught in traps, and will also steal the bait when wolf traps are baited with meat. Snakes and wild ducks, and an occasional goose, also may figure in their diet.

Hawk Tribe Always Hunted.

The hand of civilized man has been raised universally against the hawk tribe, and birds of this group are shot or otherwise destroyed at every opportunity. It is rare, indeed, for hawks to come within gun range of a hunter without receiving a charge of shot, and they are killed in many localities by setting steel traps on the tops of posts or poles that the birds utilize as perches.

The majestic bald eagle, our national bird, has fallen under the displeasure of some farmers and has been rather relentlessly hunted.

Bird lovers have taken up the fight on behalf of this great bird of freedom, declaring that he has been misrepresented and that his occasional thefts of poultry are more than offset by services in keeping our beaches clean of dead fish.

The flight and appearance of hawks and other birds, and certain of their anatomical features, were used by the augurs of ancient Rome in their prophecies of the future. A more practical use of these birds was found among the North American Indians, particularly of the Plains and Pueblo groups, when beautiful headdresses were made from the large feathers of the golden eagle, and other ornaments and decorations were fashioned from the smaller feathers of this bird and from the feathers of hawks. The downy bases of the eagle feathers sometimes were twisted in strands that were woven into feather blankets of a peculiar and interesting type. Hawks and eagle claws were used to make necklaces and other decorations.

Selection of Shortening

Some care must be used in selecting the proper shortening for frying purposes. To fry properly, the shortening must be raised to a high temperature. Some fats smoke before they reach this temperature. These fats are not good. As soon as fat smokes it begins to change chemically and quickly becomes rancid.

Bird Able to Foretell Good and Bad Seasons

Many wild creatures have uncanny ways of forecasting the weather, writes O. G. Pike, the naturalist, in London Tit-Bits. They know to a certainty when a violent change is approaching, and those of us who can read the secrets of the fields are often able to predict coming gales or storms with more certainty than our meteorological office.

One can understand a bird or mammal having a presentiment of a gale or storm which is likely to arrive within a few hours, but what can one think of wild birds that are able to arrange their domestic affairs according to the kind of weather they are going to live through months ahead?

The spotted bower bird of western Australia is able to accomplish this. Her usual clutch of eggs is two, but she varies the number according to the amount of food she will be able to collect for her family when they arrive. If a good season is approaching she will lay three eggs, for instinct tells her that food will be plentiful. If a long drouth is on its way, she gives up domestic affairs entirely for that season. If moderate weather is expected, a single egg is laid. The mating season is about six weeks ahead of the actual hatching, so she has to work out her problems well in advance.

Safetygrams

The Safety Man

The other day while visiting with a friend of mine the subject of automobile driving, of course, was discussed.

He told me he always surrenders the right-of-way whether he has it or not. In the discussion that followed, I asked him why he did this and here is the reply:

"If I have the right-of-way, I unhesitatingly surrender it to the other fellow, for I have been in hospitals to visit friends who had the right-of-way and who could prove it through their bandages".

That is good practical horse sense. If a man insists on having the right-of-way whether it really belongs to him or not, shows lack of judgement and you might as well let him go. You cannot argue with that sort of person.

A little paactice of this kind by all of us will make intersections much safer.

HOME RAMBLES

"An outstanding accomplishment" is the comment of Dr. Paul Hagen, Crookston, vice president of the Minnesota Division of the Izaak Walton League when advised that actual physical improvement on the Mud Lake wild migratory bird nesting ground and refuge in northwestern Minnesota is to be started this fall. Federal funds will be used to acquire land and perform necessary construction work with the U. S. Bureau of Biological Survey in charge.

Rapid progress has been made in acquiring lands to be included in the 75,000-acre restoration project because of "perfect cooperation by the state department of conservation, according to J. N. Darling, Bureau Chief.

Mr. Darling said that "one of the best angles of the Mud Lake Project is the way Commissioner E. V. Willard and members of the Game and Fish Division have tied in with perfect cooperation."

Initial work in the western part of the area effecting about 30,000 acres will include the two Olson Lakes and Kuriko, Whiskey, Mud, Greenstump and Elm Lakes where most of the development structures are needed.

Mr. Darling said that "in no state in the Union have I had such splendid demonstration of unselfish aid as I have had from Commissioner Willard and Director Erling Swenson of the Game and Fish Division."

To combat peat fires in the northern part of the state which have become more of a fire hazard this year than ever before because of the large quantities of hay being cut in the forests in Northern Minnesota, $35,000 was given the Forestry Division of the Conservation Commission by the Executive council at it's last meeting.

Bang's Disease Explained

Bang's disease, also known as contagious or infectious abortion, or slinking of calves, is one of the most serious diseases, from a dollar and cents standpoint, that affects the dairy cattle. Few herds of long standing have escaped its destructive influences.

Bang's disease is caused by a specific germ, named after Dr. Bang of Denmark who discovered it. It is spread chiefly in the discharges of diseased cows at calving time. Healthy cattle become infected by eating foods soiled with these discharges, or by licking infected animals.

A reliable blood test, used for many years in diagnosing numerous human and animal diseases, is the only sure method of determining whether or not cattle are infected with Bang's desease. Thirty-six states may be admitted. Many of these states, including Minnesota, also have regulations whereby cattle owners, by periodic testing and separating the diseased cattle from the rest of the herd, or selling them for slaughter, may free their herds from this disease and have them approved or accredited as "Bang-Abortion Free." To date 440 herds in this state have been certified under these plans.

This disease does not affect the value of cattle for meat purposes.

A Bang's disease eradication program, involving the free testing of herds by government-paid veterinarians, and the payment of indemnities of diseased cattle sold, will soon be undertaken in this county.

Any one interested in this program should communicate with R. A. Reierson, Emergency Agr. Agent at Warren, Minn.

R. A. Reierson will conduct a meeting in Holt on Friday, September 28 at 2 p. m., and will then explain how you can have your cattle sold and tested. Be on hand for this is important.

Chicken hunting was the main sport Sunday when the season opened for shooting in northwestern Minnesota. Many local sportsmen report that they bagged the limit.

Ludvig Sagstuen and family who have the past few years farmed the Frank Coppay farm south of town, have rented the former T. E. Ellestad farm north of Holt and moved there Saturday.

Hjalmer Stokke of Newfolden is advertising a big list of horses cows and farm machinery at publsc auction on his farm Wednesday, Sept., 26th. Mr. Stokke has sold his farm and purchased the Newfolden Auto Company.

Advice of Inspectors

Quality is a very important factor in the production of cream, with inspectors inspecting all butter that comes on the market, for foreign matter such as flies and other things that may get into the cream, which may result in a total loss of some churnings. Let's all work hand in hand to prevent such happenings.

Five Weeks on Wheels
High Lights of An Auto Tour to the West Coast
by Hans O. Hanson
V. Rolling Down to Frisco

We are now at the California state line in the very northwest corner of the state. Our first move was to unpack everything that we had along and have it all inspected by members of the Agriculture Department of that state. These state men were checking everything that came into the state for different bugs and beetles that damage fruits. At this particular time they were keeping close watch for a citrus beetle that was on the rampage in Oregon.

We were told by these inspectors, who are stationed at every main road coming into California, that they were trying hard to keep out all fruit disease and make their large orchards clean and accredited. Fruit from an accredited orchard brought a better price. They had some of the finest fruit you could wish for in that state.

We moved on down the coast to Smith River. There we saw the monument and marked spot where two of the largest tribes of the Siskiyou Indians fought it out to a finish years ago. One remained to tell the sad story of why such was done. It all happened when one tribe came to a big peace conference all armed after they had promised to come unarmed. A promise was something worth keeping them days.

We came to Crescent City and put up for the night. That city had the first harbor to be used in California and was a real spot fifty years ago. We contacted a seventy-five year old man who was still in business there and he gave us a line on what had been there and what was going on now. He showed us that at one time ordinary tides used to come up to where he now had his store but that in the past 50 years sand had filled in the harbor so much that the tides were stopped six blocks away.

The goverment had in recent years built stone pile breakwaters three-fourths of a mile long out into the ocean to stop the washing in of sand into this crescent harbor. This project cost one and a quarter million dollars and they were going to build one more like it to make sure of a good deep harbor.

This old man also told us that in the early days he saw as many as twenty foreign ships in at one time. They all brought some kind of cargo and all took some away. He said he saw at one time when there were three ship loads of liquor in port and thirty-two saloons in town. They had 12,000 people there at that time compared to the 2,000 they had now.

When they loaded out ships he said it was general to see about three to five hundred miners come to town with a 1000 pack mules loaded down with all kinds of mineral, ores and gold. Pack mules sold for $200 each and were hard to get. Many a shot had rung out and some had hit the mark in Crescent City in the early days. Copper was sold to England in shiploads from there before the last war.

We were told that out from this town a little ways was a deep canyon cutting thru the wild mountain country in which during the many past years only a few old prospectors have stuck it out along a rocky creek. Now since the depression hit people they had come from every state in the Union to pan gold there. Many of them had never done any gold digging before and did not make much at it while some made big wages per day.

They went over all the old diggins in this 80 mile long canyon and were always looking for the hidden metal in new places. One day a man was out only a few minutes from his camp when he found $5000 worth of gold. This news spread like fire and now there were several thousand people that had come there to try their luck. They came in all kinds of rigs from model T's to twin 8 cadilacs and lived in anything from silklined tents to burlap sacks stretched around trees.

From Crescent City we took our last stretch of 125 along the beautiful sea coast to Eureka. There we met a woman who, when she saw our car license, asked us if we were from near Duluth. (er ni fran Duluth sa guma? Nie sa ja er fran Holt a da jik hun sin veg). At this place they had a house made out of a huge red wood tree which they had sawed down and hollowed out, making the house look like a large log. It had several rooms in it and was used as a curiosity house where they sold all kinds of souvenirs.

This tree was 18 feet in diameter at 40 feet above ground and the top of the stump near it which, was also cut out for a house, was 25 feet across. The saw which had been used to cut down this tree was on display there. It was 22½ feet long between the handles and the teeth in it were 4 inches long. The large redwook log used for this house scaled out 361,331 board feet of lumber. This is enough to build twenty-two ordinary homes.

From there on south we started to travel inland thru the giant redwood groves. We had over a hundred miles of this beautiful drive on a oiled road in and out among these prehistoric giants of the west. It may seem kind of tall when we tell you that most of these trees are from 200 to 300 feet high. The tallest tree in the world is a redwood at Dyerville, California. It is 365 feet tall and it measures 278 feet up to the first branches. Enough lumber could be cut from it to make 25 homes. There are several hundred thousand acres of these redwoods out there that are owned by the government and large lumber companies also own a few million acres of them.

These trees grew mostly along the Eel river and on the Dyerville mud flats which had been created by silt from overflows of this river. One would have to see these giants of the earth to really get an idea of how tall and beautiful they are. There two kinds of redwoods. The tallest ones grow on the coast below 2500 feet above sea level and the shorter and larger in diameter species grow only above 5000 feet above sea level. These real stout redwoods grow only up in the Yosemite National park.

We were told that these trees were over 3000 years old. They never die and will not burn green on the stump. We figured to make San Francisco in this installment but are forced to hold it until next week. C-U then.

For A Safe September

September will be Safety Month in 39 states and the District of Columbia. By executive proclamation, an effort will be made to arouse public interest in one of the most pressing problems of the day — the conservation of human life.

Special emphasis will be placed on motor driving, and, judging by stastics, there was never greater need for it. Unless there is a marked improvement in the highway accident record during the very worst months of the year— September, October and November— the number of automobile deaths and injuries for 1934 may break all records. According to late reports, the number of fataltics for June was 14 percent greater than in 1933, and the average increase for the first six months of the year is now about 20 percent.

If this trend continues, deaths for the year will number nearly 35,000, or more than for the worst year on record, 1931, which had 33,000.

The task facing us this year is much greater, and the duty of citizens, drivers and pedestrians more pressing than ever before. The state executives will call upon the authorities to do all in their power to check accidents. But these authorities need help and cooperation. It will therefore be the duty and obligation of individuals to exercise greater care.

Each year the proclamations have had a salutary effect on on the driving record. In 1933 it was estimated that the month of September saw a reduction of 200 fatalities from the corresponding period of the previous year. If the work this year accomplishes a similar result, it will be eminently worth while.

Nome, Alaska Burned Down

Nome, famous Alaska gold mining city, was destroyed by fire Monday, and Monday night only two business buildings, including a hotel, and a few residences in the northern part of town, were standing.

The fire department building was destroyed, handicapping efforts of firemen and volunteers.

Late in the afternoon, dynamite was used in an effort to destroy buildings and check the flames, but the fire roared onward.

With every available man fighting unsuccessfully to stop the fire, mining operations in the outskirts were stopped, and men were rushing here to help.

Every grocery store was destroyed and very little food was saved from the shelves of the stores, the owners reported. An early estimate of the fire loss was placed at $750,000, with the probability it would rise to $1,000,000.

The temperature reached a low of 38 Sun. night, but an east wind of a 22 mile velocity early in the day sent the fire out of control, shortly after it was discovered. Origin of the fire was not learned immediately.

Famed throughout the north for its gold mining, Nome is a small city near Cape Nome, on the southern shore of the Seward peninsula.

In 1900, its population was 12,488 but in recent years it has declined to about 1,500.

The Reason Why

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

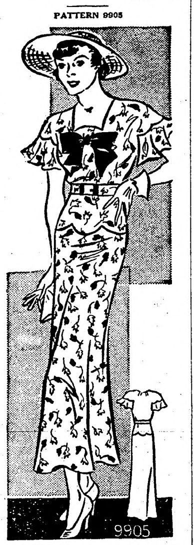
Frock That Makes Its Own Appeal

PATTERN 9905



Probably you are already quite prepared to pounce upon this design. It usually has that effect. If you are a woman who "budgets" and counts her pennies, we are dead certain about your frame of mind. It will be simply devastating in any of those pretty inexpensive cotton prints—and Bridget will beam on you when it goes to the laundry. Those graceful sleeve flares alone, not to mention the scalloped details, are enough to make a woman decide she cannot live without it.

Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

Pattern 9905 may be ordered only in sizes 12, 14, 16, 18, 20, 30, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42. Size 16 requires 8½ yards 30-inch fabric and ¾ yard 2-inch ribbon.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER AND SIZE.

Deceiving

Robinson had taken his car to a garage for minor repairs.

"Great scott, no!" said the man. "I thought you'd made it yourself."

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a faculty position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer meets Prof. Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy. At the railroad station they meet Mrs. Denver, engaged as matron. At the school the group is struck by an air of mystery pervading the place. Gordon Haskell, proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne completes the Academy faculty. In a schoolroom Janet finds a group which the teachers had supposed were scholars, are wax figures. Haskell explains the unusual circumstances connected with the conduct of the Academy. Among the pupils is Berenice Bracebridge, daughter of the late owner of the school.

—8—

Arthur rested on his oars a moment and gazed back at the vast pile of the old academy. "That comes in very pat with the conversation I overheard. I believe those four wax figures are the crux of the whole mystery. Do you believe his story about Miss Bracebridge?"

"It sounds reasonable enough. And she is certainly like her father's portrait; in fact, she reminds me—ah, I know. She is like the four wax figures—startlingly like them; it's a curious beauty; almost shy and elusive.

"You said the girl figures were beautiful."

"Quite lovely!"

"Didn't Haskell say there were five children?"

"Yes."

"She is the only remaining one—perhaps. He said! . . many deaths; yes, many deaths?"

"But if he is afraid of them," she queried, "why not have them out of the way?"

"Do you think he is actually afraid of them—or of an idea back of them?"

She mused on this. "How could there be an idea about them?"

"I should like to see them closer. Were they well made?"

"Startlingly well made; the work of a genuine artist, I should say. The faces of the two young girls were very lovely; sweet, frustrated faces, if one can speak so of a wax figure; the young boys are handsome fellows—very! If they came to life! Why, what is the matter?"

His arm had jerked an oar until the boat fairly spun round. He laughed nervously. "I suppose that great barrack of a building has made me jumpy; but I thought I saw a face down there—in the lake." He pointed to the dark surface covering incalculable depths. "It seemed rising up to meet me, as drowned faces rise. There! the foolish fancy is over! I'm sorry I jerked the boat. Please don't think me superstitious!"

"I don't. Whatever do you gather from this note?"

"That he has a secret enemy in the establishment, who wants to warn us against something."

"Against what?"

He gazed at her solemnly. "I think we are in danger of no ordinary kind. I've followed the advertisements of educational institutions for several years and I've forgotten nearly all of them because they rang true. You knew in reading them that their achievements were a matter of open and honorable history. Any parent or guardian could feel reasonably satisfied that he was on the right track; but Haskell's advertisement stood out startlingly. From the first it seemed strange to me. But because he wanted teachers, not pupils, I answered it."

They made their way with some difficulty up the magnificent bed of the creek. Here and there a mountain giant of a pine fallen into the stream created a barrage that made a miniature falls and wild eddies in which the red leaves whirled. Afar off they heard a steady roaring which they knew must proceed from the great fall. Janet came on after him, surefooted and graceful.

"Be careful," he warned her. "The stream is not very deep, but the current is terrific. It would sweep you off your feet in an instant. Don't get too close."

A well-defined little footpath skirted the stream between its wild waters and the great immobile rocks. The ravine narrowed steadily, the cliffs rising higher and higher and drawing closer together until they seemed almost ready to close out the sky. Then the cliffs departed from their straight line, became concave, forming a vast aperture something of an ellipse in shape. At its further end a sheet of water, thick and straight as a section of Niagara, dropped a sheer two hundred feet from an out-jutting rock and with a wild roar filled a funnel-shaped aperture at the foot of the cliff with a mad whirl of water.

"How lovely! How terrifying!"

"Even nature is terrifying in this region. Oh, don't go too near."

She had gone lightly on ahead of him to a vast, slippery black rock which overhung the whirl; and was gazing as if fascinated.

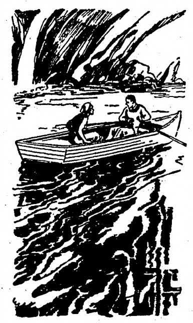
"Don't go too near!" he roared, making a megaphone of his fist. "Nothing on earth could get you out of there if once you fell in. I'm a strong swimmer—but we'd both be drowned.

"I think," he went on, "that there must be a subterranean current at the bottom of that funnel which, meeting the water of the fall, creates this whirl. But, see. Isn't that a path coming down the cliff almost above the whirl? What idiot would ever try it except perhaps in the driest summer weather! Why, that's an awful place!"

Scarcely were the words out of his mouth than from the trees which formed at one part of the path's zigzag course a merciful barrier from the precipice below—from these trees a figure appeared; and by her copper-colored suit they recognized Berenice Bracebridge. She seemed to be admiring the scenery and taking little heed of the slippery, almost precipitous path which led to a tiny patch of rock; the most fragmentary platform above the great whirl. Arthur gesticulated wildly, and at the same instant a voice back of him cried:

"Don't! Don't, Fleming, you might startle her!"

It was Wilton Payne. But as if oblivious himself of the whirling danger, he pressed forward and stood erect as an Indian on the edge of the boulder, his dark eyes fixed with anxiety, admiration and fear upon the girl, who returned his gaze across the chasm with a kind of proud acceptance of his homage, and waved her hand lightly. Then she turned and went into the shelter of the trees. A moment later they saw her high above them, following the windings of the path with surefooted accuracy, though from their position it looked like a ladder against the solid rock.



"But I Thought I Saw a Face Down There—in the Lake."

"My heart almost stopped beating," Janet said. "It seemed as if the next step would be her last."

"Yet she must know the dangers far better than we do," Payne commented. "I did not mean to follow you, but Haskell saw you rowing toward the ravine, and he sent me after you to warn you to be careful not to go too near the whirl. He said a whole family had been swept down into it at once—no other than the children of the last president of Lostland academy, Dr. Jethro Bracebridge—Berenice's brothers and sisters. They were playing, the four of them, at Alpine climbing, and they had tied themselves together with ropes. The youngest, a girl about thirteen, lost her footing and pulled the others down before they could brace themselves. Of course, tied together as they were, they had no chance in the whirl."

"How terrible!" Janet exclaimed. "Ah, now I know—those four figures are likenesses of those children."

"Precisely—memorials! I've something to tell you, but there's no use screaming it here. The roar is too hard on the vocal chords. Let us go back to the mouth of the ravine."

When they reached their boats, Payne said: "Get in—but we won't row over yet. After telling me their tale, he led me to the family burial ground—on a knoll to the northwest of the house—and sure enough there were the four graves among several others, all with the same date of death—the whirl gave up the bodies at last, it seemed. Then I mustered my courage. He had been talking tenderly of those lost children, for he had tutored them, and an idea had flashed through my brain. I asked him boldly about the dummies. I said, 'Even in that fading light, sir, I could see they were wax figures.'

"He turned a kind of bluish wax color himself. 'Ah,' he cried, 'I'll dine with my staff tonight and tell you the whole queer story; and you'll know then why I cannot run this place as a normal boarding school is run.'"

They looked at each other; then at the wild scene about them. The sun was nearing its setting and long streamers of light pierced the titanic clouds; their edges, bright vermilion and gold, caught high elevations in a lavish outpouring of color which enveloped at last the huge brick pile on the farther side of the lake, so that it seemed like a monument of ruby floating on blue. Each window gave back the sun, and the trunks of the pines turned red and copper.

Masters of Slang Who Have Enriched Language

Wilfred J. Funk knows words. He ought to, because he publishes dictionaries and writes poetry—highly dissimilar occupations, but both dealing in words. So he may properly qualify as an expert on slang.

One feels that he is a bit too exclusive, however, in crowning only ten Americans as the fathers of modern slang, or the argot of contemporary Americana, if you must give your slang a highbrow label.

This is said in no disparagement of the magnificent audacity with which the ten he mentions have committed mayhem on innocent English. The ten—Sime Silverman, H. L. Mencken, T. A. Dorgan, Walter Winchell, Bugs Baer, Ring Lardner, Damon Runyon, Gelett Burgess, George Ade and Gene Buck—are leaders, no doubt, in the creation of the new and startling jargon. But their task is shared by thousands of others, mostly anonymous, who daily are coining new language and putting it into circulation.

The chances are that the most popular and enduring examples of slang, should they be traced to their birth by a careful scholar, could not be given a definite paternity. Like Topsy, they just grew.

Not a few of them grew on the sport pages of American newspapers.

Witness the verb to Merkle, or to pull a Merkle, which arose from an unfortunate but spectacular incident in a certain world series of 20 years ago.

And long before the modern American sport page bloomed to its present flower of lingual license, slang was being built in the same manner. Artemus Ward, Orpheus C. Kerr and Petroleum V. Nasby were doing it half a century or more ago. And before them were other generations of slang founders. Some of them attained a bit of fame in their day. Most of them are forgotten.

Long ago the wise began to recognize that slang is good English in the making. They poo poohed the strictures of the purists and hair-splitters. Much ex-slang is now in the dictionaries, frequently without the patronizing label of "colloquial."

Happily all slang does not make the grade of good, or accepted English. Frequently it is not apt and falls of its own weight. Good slang (and we maintain that the definition is valid) should be direct, illuminating, a detour to greater clarity along the sometimes tedious highways of language. As such it merits a permanent place in the language and if it is good enough it will attain it.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

CONTRAST SHOWN IN ENGLISH AND AMERICAN VIEWS

Paragraphs of Charles F. Thwing in the Review of Reviews:

The Englishman is inclined to trust no man till he has proved himself good and true. The American is inclined to trust any man till he has proved himself a scoundrel.

The English tendency is to develop the individual, the American to develop the community.

England makes few laws and enforces them. America, in both state and federal government, makes many laws and enforces few.

In England the criminal has few chances of escaping conviction, and fewer still of pardon. In America the criminal has few fears of conviction and many hopes of freedom. In one case the motto is "He ought to be punished—punish him." In the other, "Give the poor dog a chance."

The Englishman lives more in a world of reality, both in thought and act; the American more in a world of imagination and optimism.

The Englishman remembers yesterday, and anticipates tomorrow. The American works for today and takes little thought for tomorrow.

The thinking of the Englishman is more consistent, more continuous, more concentrated. The thinking of the American is more diffuse, more general, more volatile.

The Englishman believes in and uses the understatement; the American believes in and uses the power of the overstatement. In the interest of truthfulness the first represents the right of magnifying, the second represents the duty of minimizing.

REICHSFUEHRER HITLER of Germany renewed his warfare on Jews and also declared all other elements opposing his regime must be suppressed. The chancellor, addressing the annual convention of the Nazi party in Nuremberg, made a slashing attack against "Jewish influence" on German life. He was cheered frequently during his impassioned address, clarifying again his anti-Jewish, Pan-German philosophy of political and social science as the essence of his national-socialistic doctrines for ruling Germanic races.

Earlier, a proclamation by him was read to the delegates, warning that those who dared oppose the Nazi state under his rule would be ruthlessly dealt with, and outlining his achievements as head of the third reich.

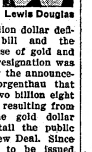
Combined with Hitler's attack on the Jews came a bitter denunciation of those "sensation-hungry correspondents interested only in external symptoms." Hitler declared they were responsible for a misconception of Germany abroad; insisted that Nazism was here to stay, and added violence and revolutions were ended.

ON THE advice of Sol Rosenblatt, divisional administrator, the NRA has indefinitely suspended the provisions of the motion picture industry code designed to limit salaries of stars and executives and to eliminate alleged unfair competitive methods in bidding for stars under contract with another company. Mr. Rosenblatt made an investigation and in his report said:

"A star or executive is worth as much as the public can be led to think he is worth by paying to see his offerings. If individual producers find it difficult to gauge in advance the possible value of these services, it is patently impossible for a code authority to exercise any more effective judgment in the matter."

RUSSIA'S ambition to be given a seat as a permanent member of the League of Nations council, favored by France and Great Britain, is opposed by Switzerland, whose delegates have been instructed to vote "no" when the question comes up. Turkey has applied for a nonpayment seat in the council, stating she seeks the place of China, whose term is expiring.

SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE WALLACE thinks it may be necessary to guarantee the price of corn fodder in order to keep available supplies on farms in the drouth area for relief purposes. The farm administration is to set up an office in Kansas City for the purpose of making a survey and locating all types of animal feed. The office also will assist county drouth committees in arranging pools of individual farmers to make purchases. The government will not buy any feed itself for distribution.



Lewis Douglas

BECAUSE of his unwavering opposition to what he considered the extravagant expenditures of the government and to its inflationary monetary policies, Lewis Douglas has resigned as director of the budget. He had long been fighting against certain of the administration's policies, without avail. The two-year budget plan with its prospective deficit of seven billion dollars, presented to congress last January, did not have his approval; nor had the billion dollar deficiency appropriation bill and the schemes for the purchase of gold and silver. It was said his resignation was finally brought about by the announcement of Secretary Morgenthau that the so-called profit of two billion eight hundred million dollars resulting from the devaluation of the gold dollar would be used to curtail the public debt incurred by the New Deal. Since currency is ultimately to be issued against this "profit," and since there is only about five billion dollars of currency now in circulation, the Morgenthau plan contemplates a 50 per cent inflation.

The President appointed as acting budget director Daniel W. Bell, a permanent employee of the treasury. It was understood in Washington that there would be a general rearrangement in the Treasury department which would concentrate all fiscal powers in the hands of Secretary Morgenthau. Several officials who are not in full sympathy with the New Deal will be weeded out.

MANY of the dairy cattle bought by the government in drouth areas are of high breed and so will not be slaughtered. The federal relief administration gave out a statement saying:

"It is planned to either exchange some of these high breed drouth cattle for scrub cattle now in the possession of relief or rural rehabilitation families, or to issue them to such families where the need has been determined. Under this program the low-grade scrub cattle would be slaughtered where exchanges were made. The exchanges, or issuance of cattle without exchange, would be made upon recommendation of the various county relief administrations and county rural rehabilitation supervisors."

AFTER five days of deliberation, the high council of the Salvation Army, sitting in London, elected Commander Evangeline Booth general of the army. Thus the supreme command of the organization is returned to the Booth family after a break of five years. Miss Booth, who is sixty-eight years old, is the only daughter of Gen. William Booth, founder of the army. For thirty years she has been at the head of the army in America.

Always Unwise to Stress One's "Sense of Duty"

A sense of responsibility, so important to strong and fine characters, does not add to one's personal charm when paraded in social circles. Many times an onlooker can see a valued friend lose popularity because of carrying too heavy an air of duty to good times, where laughter and hilarity are more in order.

Often the person of whom this is true craves the very light-heartedness which he or she sees and which makes others loved for their gaiety.

Women who have the cares of running a home upon their shoulders cannot be expected to actually throw them to the four winds when they are "off duty." But, while harboring them mentally, they can at least subdue them to the background of their consciousness, and keep them out of their conversation. It will do them good to talk of other matters than household concerns, and it will tend to make them more interesting.

There is a certain sense of rebuke felt when someone at a social gathering acts as if the right amount of attention to certain details of the event depends entirely upon her efforts. It happens that anyone familiar with club management can detect this attitude in some member or group. Whether justly or unjustly felt, popularity declines with increase of this emphasis.

On the whole, it is an act of selfishness to lay a damper on the spirit of any party to which the "humor" is good, as they say abroad. There are persons ready to do this without any real reason, other than their desire to seem superior, and to make others appear inconsequential by comparison. A censorious nature chooses this avenue to direct attention to itself. So the really agreeable person will suffer by being thought one of these forbidding creatures, if he or she allows this atmosphere of duty before pleasure to seem to take the foreground.

Old Idea Refuted

A scientific expedition found new and definite proof that the old empire of the Mayan Indians, in and around the region of San Jose, was not abandoned in a great mysterious wave of migration northward to Yucatan, as some archeologists have thought. This supposed wholesale desertion of the great cities, 1,100 years ago, is refuted by the discovery that San Jose was occupied continuously from the time of Christ or earlier down to about the Fifteenth century.—Science Service, Kansas City Star.

Horror of Horrors

Coal Deposits Reveal Secrets of Past Ages

Tucked away in a lump of coal are the secrets of life 250,000,000 years ago. Not only that, but the specific nature of the spores or pollen contained in the lump indicates, when examined under the microscope, the very seam to which the coal belongs. Such are the facts emerging from a microscopic investigation into the structure of coal, a work of supreme scientific importance in regard to the utilization of its by-products which Doctor Raistrick, of the department of geology at Armstrong college, Newcastle, England, has been conducting for eight years.

From his researches also, the college hopes to correlate the seams of the northern coalfields, and thus relieve collieries of expenditure incurred in mining comparatively barren fields.

The minute coal spores, from one-thousandth to two-thousandths of an inch in diameter, and perfectly preserved in their original design, afford conclusive proof that trees in the carboniferous age, when the great coal forests of the world were laid down, differed vastly from trees as we know them today. They were in the main giant clumps of rank, flowerless plants of the horse-tail or fern variety. An idea of their immensity may be gained from the fact that to produce a seam of coal two feet thick, the vegetation itself when laid down could not have been less than sixty feet thick. An occasional seam is found fifty feet deep, the product of a murky, matted forest too dense to permit animal life, which must have been a quarter of a mile high. Nowhere does vegetation today attain such monstrous proportions. This is due to the gradual cooling of the earth.

Conserving Fur Bearers

Fur production on Louisiana's bird sanctuaries has increased eight-fold in the last three years, Armand Daspit, director of the wild life division of the state conservation department, said in a report. He estimated that 350,000 muskrats would be taken from the bird refugees this season, compared with 48,000 three years ago.

SAFEST TIRES IN THE WORLD!

Here's PROOF OF SAFETY
TWO BREATH-TAKING ENDURANCE RUNS ON SAME TRACK—A DRAMATIC COMPARISON OF SAFETY! READ BOTH LETTERS BELOW!

THE proof of leadership is performance! Many claim it, but Firestone proves it. Never before have tires withstood such severe, continuous, grinding torture, breaking 77 records for 3,000 consecutive miles at 127.2 miles an hour. Not a Gum-Dipped cord loosened, not a tread separated, not one blowout.

Hour after hour, on through the scorching heat of the day and inky blackness of the night, with temperatures as high as 120 degrees—breaking record after record for speed, strength, safety and blowout protection—all in a stupendous demonstration of safety performance for the car owners of America.

This remarkable achievement was made possible by Gum-Dipping, the Firestone patented process which saturates and coats every fiber within the cords with liquid rubber—counteracting friction and heat and preventing the tire from heating up and blowing out.

Mr. Harvey S. Firestone, Chairman,
Firestone Tire & Rubber Company,
Akron, Ohio

Dear Mr. Firestone:

Under A.A.A. supervision I have just completed a 3,000 mile endurance run on the hot salt desert at Lake Bonneville, Utah. My car, weighing over 5,000 pounds, traveled the 3,000 miles at an average speed of 127.2 miles per hour, breaking 77 World, International and American Speed Records--all without tire trouble of any kind. Firestone Tires gave an almost unbelievable performance in this run, particularly when you realize that the temperatures were as high as 120 degrees and that the holes in the course had been filled with crushed rock that was hard as flint and had knife sharp edges.

This endurance run was the severest test to which I have ever subjected any automobile and especially tires. Last year I made a similar run with a car of less power and less speed using tires of another make whose national advertising featured blowout protection. Yet, I had a blowout and made a number of tire changes.

This year I also used Firestone Spark Plugs and a Firestone Extra Power Battery made with your new All-Rubber Separator. Not a Spark Plug failed and the Battery required no service of any kind.

If every car owner knew what my Firestone Tires went through they would appreciate what Gum-Dipping means in [illegible] strength and heat protection that make Firestone Tires safe from blowouts.

This is the toughest run I have ever made in my twenty-three years of breaking speed records and after a short stay here I am coming East. Hoping to have the pleasure of seeing you then, and with best regards, I remain

Sincerely yours,
Ab Jenkins

Akron, Ohio

Dear Mr. Firestone:

I have just finished a 2,000 mile test run on the salt beds at Lake Bonneville, Utah, driving a stock car of a leading automobile manufacturer. This car was equipped with a nationally known brand of tires which a large manufacturer has recently brought out as the newest development in tire construction and for which their 1934 advertising has made many extravagant testing and performance claims.

With these tires on this run I had eleven tire failures and made two precautionary tire changes. When a right front tire blew out, my car left the track and I was unable to get it under control for a quarter of a mile, leaving a trail of rubber and fabric on the hot salt beds.

After an experience of this kind, I appreciate more than ever what a vital part Firestone Gum-Dipped Tires have played in my success during the fourteen years I have used them on my racing and personal cars. Without them I know that I could never have made the many speed records that I have established.

I understand that you expect to be in California soon and if convenient, I would like to see you.

Very truly yours,
Wilbur Shaw

At the first meeting of the Executive Council since the strike in Minneapolis, $60,000 was appropriated as a state supplement to Federal students aid. The state's contribution to needy college students will amount to approximately $10 per month per student, raising the amount the students get to $25 per month. The idea of the state contributing to the education of needy students was original in Minnesota last year and enabled about 2300 students to attend the University of Minnesota and colleges throughout the state who otherwise would be unable to do so. Last year $71,000 was appropriated but only $50,000 was expended.

HOME RAMBLES

More safety should be taught in our schools. Statistics show that youthful drivers of high-school age are notoriously unsafe. The high scoools prepare those boys and girls for various activities of life, but when it comes to an activity that we are sure most of them all will take up - that of driving a car - they do comparatively little.

Accident prevention and safety in automobile driving does not come naturally. Youth is reckless and daring. It wants speed- it wants to travel fast- it wants to creat a sensation.

These are not safe practices and effort should be made to instruct high school students and college students about the art of safe driving and the necessity for concerned action.

If it's an educational problem it should be given consideration in the school.

Bang's Disease Meet Today

Bang's disease and its control will be discussed at a series of meetings scheduled for Marshall County which started on Tuesday, Sept. 25 with a meeting in Warren and will continue thru until Oct. 6th when the final meeting will be held at Strandquist.

A meeting is being held here today. Farmers at all interested should make it a point to attend one of these meetings, at which time the government plan to control this disease, which is causing so much loss to farmers thruout this nation and which is the cause of undulant fever in man will be discussed. The plan briefly is to pay a maximum indemnity of $20 per head for the grade animals reacting to the test and $50 per head for registered purebreds. Besides this the farmers will receive whatever a reactor will bring as beef. This is without cost to the farmer.

The only cost in connection with the program will be that should reactors be found on a farm the farmer will be required to disinfect his premises in accordance with instruction given by inspectors who are veterinarians employed by the Minnesota Livestock Sanitary Board. This should not exceed three dollars on the average farm.

This will be an excellent opportunity for a farmer to find out if his herd is free from this disease and if reactors are found the farmer, can remove these animals from his herd without any loss and save the balance of his herd from the spread of this disease.

Contracts will be signed at these meetings and when a sufficient number of cattle have been signed up, tests will be started in this county.

The program is entirely voluntaiy and only herds of farmers signing contracts will be tested.

Advice of Inspectors
Quality is a very important factor in the production of cream, with inspectors inspecting all butter that comes on the market, for foreign matter such as flies and other things that may get into the cream, which may result in a total loss of some churnings. Five Weeks on Wheels

High Lights of An Auto Tour to the West Coast

by Hans O. Hanson

6. In & Out of San Francisco

Last week we left you in our story as we had just come out of the giant redwoods a hundred and fifty miles north of Frisco. We had spent the night at Willits, a county seat. There a man jumped on our neck because we were from the same state as W. B. Foshay. It seems as if he had swindled the people there out of their electric light plant and some money at the time he was promoting high lines thruout the country a few years ago.

Moving on again we passed thru some very fine farming and fruit country in a valley along the Russian river. We came to Santa Rosa and, out of the many both large and small cities that we passed thru on our journey, this place caught our eye as the most beautiful place of them all. From there on to the Bay it was practically all one city as the small towns were only a few miles apart and some were already interbuilt.

We came into Sausalito which is on the Bay across from Frisco and there we took one of the large ferry boats for the big city. It took us forty minutes on the boat to cross the seven miles of water. While out on this ferry we went up on the top deck to view the scenery around the bay.

The first place we passed near was the San Quentin penitentiary with its huge stone wall and dark buildings situated on a rock cliff near the water. The place to see was the Alcatraz Island where the government sends all the hardened criminals that never again have a chance to gain thier freedom. This island is small and situated two miles out from the nearest shore and the swift waters of the bay are everlastingly pounding their waves against the high stone wall that surrounds the penitentiary there. When one enters there to spend his last days we can't figure out what kind of a mind he must have if, after seeing the well guarded place, he still feels optemistic about breaking out.

We also passed near where the Golden Gate bridge was being built. The towers on both ends of this world's longest suspension bridge were almost completed when we were there. We could well grasp a vision of what this mile and quarter long suspension span bridge would look like as, we have in our travels in the eastern states, crossed some of same type construction.

We docked at the foot of Hyde street and started up the chev and went out on a tour to see the thousand and one beautiful sight in the old city of San Francisco. After having a lunch we drove out to the Golden Gate park and there we saw wonders that we wish every person in this community could some day have the opportunity to see.

This park was reclamed from the rolling sand dunes and is spread over 1013 acres of ground along the ocean beach in the west central part of the city. Plants and trees have been brot from afar and ever-changing thousands of flower beds are made to bloom throughout the year along the twenty some miles of curving parkways.

Every turn of every walk and drive disclosed some gorgeous surprise and [illegible] sign that said keep off the grass. The de Young Museum, Aacademy of Science, Aquarium and a Japanese Tea Garden were some of the important places we visited in the park. They had a world-famous Zoo and wonderful amusements. Amundson's little ship Gjoa in which he found the northwest passage, was on display in this park.

After a drive thru the busy business section and a last look at the now modern city but, which was first built on the hull of ships, we again were on our way home. It was at Frisco we quit going west and south and, turned northeast homeward.

We took a ferry across the bay again and docked at Oakland. While on this boat we saw where they were putting in a new bridge across the shallow part of the bay between the two cities. This bridge was many miles long and was put on concrete piers. In this part of the bay were anchored many of the large U.S. battleships. We also had the pleasure while on the top deck of this ferry, to see a giant dirigible but were unable learn whether or not it was the U. S. Macon. You can't imagine what they look like until you see one. From there we started up thru the Sacramento valley and at that time it was hotter there than a bad man's hereafter. The thormometer was froze on a 117 in the shade. We pulled into capitol city and visited the state capitol and John Sutter's fort. This fort is now a very fine museum in the heart of the city.

Near this city was found the gold nugget that started the rush in 1849. There ended the Overland Trail and the flight of the Pony Express. Traveling on up thru the valley we came to Folsom state prison. There a convict had escaped only two hours before we got there and they sure were staging a real man-hunt for him that morning.

From there on we started on long climb up into the Sierra Nevada mountains. It was a a lot of beautiful scenery along the highway up thru the canyon we followed in these mountans hundreds of people had wonderful summer homes there along a cool rapid mountain stream. We finally came to the top and were then at an elevation of about 7000 feet above sea level. The peaks were bare and rocky so we had the opportunity of looking over the country about us for miles.

Going down the east slope we came in sight of Lake Tahoe. This beautiful lake hangs a mile up in the mountains. Of Lake Tahoe. Mark Twain wrote: "As I go back in spirit and recall that noble sea, reposing among snow-clad peaks 6000 feet above the ocean, the conclusion comes upon me again that Como would only seem a little bedizened courier in that august presence...a sea whose royal seclusion is guarded by a cordon of central peaks that lift their frosty fronts 9000 feet above the level world; a sea whose every aspect is impressive, whose belongings are all beautiful, whose lovely majesty types the Deity."

You can tell by this quotation that it was nice around Lake Tahoe and great was the sport of spiraling down the mountain side a thousand feet above it.

We are at the Nevada state line southwest of Carson City.

DEPOSITS INSURED BY
The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation
WASHINGTON, D. C.
$5000 MAXIMUM INSURANCE FOR EACH DEPOSITOR $5000

The Marshall County State Bank today received from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation at Washington the official signs which will hang at all receiving windows as visible evidence that the depositors of this institution are insured.

The Marshall County State Bank is one of more than 14,000 licenced banks in the country which are receiving these signs.

Insured banks are able to offer protection to their depositors up to $5,000. Statistical studies have shown that this maximum fully protects more than 97 per cent of all the depositors in insured banks.

A statement by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation follows:

The purpose of the signs is to let depositors know which banks are insured. Heretofore, although 90 percent of the licensed banks are insured, depositors have had no easy means of identifying them.

If, by any unforseen circumstance, an insured bank should suspend, the Insusance Corporation would begin paying off the depositors just as soon as a receiver was appointed for the closed institution. The depositors would receive their money in a few days instead of waiting months or years as was the case in the former liquidation. This is not only a benefit to the depositors, but it saves the community from a terrific economic and social blow. When the depositors receive their insured accounts they assign their claims to the Insurance Corporation. Thereafter liquidation proceeds on a business-like basis with the maximum chance of the Corporation and other creditors being paid in full."

The Reason Why - -
The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.
For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.
If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

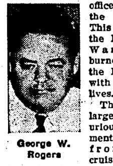
Probing the Morro Castle Disaster—Textile Strike Mediation Fails and Rioting Is Resumed—Profits in War Munitions.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.



George W. Rogers

NEARLY always in the case of a marine disaster persons come forward with accusations of negligence and misbehavior on the part of the officers and crew of the vessel concerned. This is true now of the Morro Castle, the Ward liner which burned eight miles off the New Jersey coast with a loss of 135 lives.

The Morro Castle, large, swift, and luxurious in its appointments, was returning from a seven-day cruise to Havana. The ship's master, Capt. Robert Wilmott, had died of heart disease only a few hours before the tragedy, and William F. Warms, chief officer, was in command. With 12 other officers and members of the crew he stood by the blazing ship until the hulk was towed to Asbury Park and beached.

Several of the surviving passengers testified before the federal steamboat inspection board that no alarm was sounded and little or no aid was given panic-stricken passengers by the members of the crew. Then George W. Rogers, chief radio operator, and his first assistant, George I. Alagna, told of the delay in sending out the SOS call, asserting they could not obtain an order for it from the bridge. This, of course, was explained by the usual reluctance of steamship officers to call for help because the salvage charges are heavy. Alagna was put under arrest as a material witness after he had told his story to a federal grand jury. The value of his testimony was somewhat lessened by Rogers' admission to both the board and the grand jury that Alagna had been distrusted by Captain Wilmott as a radical and an agitator, and that Alagna some months ago tried to instigate a riot on the ship as a protest against the food served the crew.

The first actual evidence indicating that the fire was of incendiary origin was furnished by Quartermaster Gus Harmon.

"It was like the flash of a 16-inch gun," he declared. "It couldn't have been gasoline because it traveled much faster. It might have been some sort of chemical, all of which would light up when one point of it started. There was a funny, acrid smoke coming out of the flash."

Other officers of the ship testified that they believed the fire was of incendiary origin, and was fed by gasoline or chemicals, but they could suggest no motive for such a horrible crime. Acting Captain Warms said he based his opinion that the blaze was incendiary on two facts: First, because on August 27, on a previous voyage to Havana, there was a suspicious blaze in the No. 5 hold; second, because reports to him indicated that the writing room locker, in which the fatal fire started, exploded. The flames, he explained further, acted "like gasoline or kerosene," and fire extinguishers had no effect on them.

The chief of the secret police in Havana declares the burning of the Morro Castle was an act of sabotage by members of a secret international maritime association that takes its orders from the Communists of Moscow.

THE International Typographical union, in convention at Chicago, defeated a proposal by delegates representing local No. 6 of New York for a four day thirty hour week, to be optional with each local by a referendum vote. Charges were made that the plan had been instigated by Communists in control of the New York local, who are seeking to wreck the international organization and vilify its officers.

The accusation was denied by the president of the local, which has a membership of 10,500 union printers in New York. Other delegates supplied the convention with circulars setting forth the charges of communistic interference.

EFFORTS of President Roosevelt's mediation board to bring about a peaceful settlement of the textile strike failed when the employers, according to the board, refused to make any concessions that would open the way to arbitration. The strike leaders had insisted that all the mills must remain closed pending arbitration, and this was rejected by the mill owners. The cotton textile employers then declared flatly that they did not believe the issues at stake are "appropriate subjects for arbitration."

The immediate result of this breakdown in negotiations was the resumption of violence and disorder, especially in Rhode Island. Thousands of strikers and their sympathizers fought with National Guard detachments in Saylesville and Woonsocket, driving back the greatly outnumbered soldiers. Tear gas, nausea gas and finally bullets were used to check the rioters and many persons were wounded, some fatally. Governor Green made some concessions to the Saylesville strikers and ordered that there should be no more shooting. But at Woonsocket conditions grew momentarily worse and the police commissioner of the city asked the governor to obtain federal troops to stop the rioting. The major in command of the National Guardsmen there admitted the situation was out of control. Great crowds were looting shops in the downtown section and others were threatening the Woonsocket Rayon company's plant.

Fearing major bloodshed and death, Governor Green read the riot act and asked President Thomas F. McMahon of the United Textile Workers of America to hasten there from Washington. The governor also ordered the mobilization of 1,000 World war veterans and a statewide roundup of Communist agitators.

Explaining the employers' refusal to compromise, the cotton textile code authority pointed out that the hours and wages and other conditions against which the union is striking are set forth in an NRA code. This code, the employers say, was set up to be the "law merchant" for the industry, and the strike, therefore, is an attempt to change the industrial law by violence and intimidation.

FOUR members of the Du Pont family, Pierre, Irenee, Felix and Lammot, appeared before the senate munitions inquiry committee and told of the huge business the Du Pont corporation has done in supplying war material. Between 1914 and 1918 the company, which was founded in 1802 to manufacture black powder, filled $1,245,000,000 worth of war orders. In that time it did about 35 times the business it had in the year just before the World war, when its sales amounted to $36,000,000.

Irenee du Pont testified that the corporation subscribed to preferred stock in the German dye patents seized during the war by the United States. He said these patents had resulted in a "great service" to America. The corporation entered the dye business after the war as a licensee of the Chemical foundation, Du Pont said.

There did not seem to be anything very sensational or scandalous in the facts elicited from the Du Ponts, but previous witnesses had told a lot about the deals of airplane companies and other corporations with foreign nations in which it was alleged they had been aided by United States diplomats and army and navy officers. There was a lot, too, about graft on the part of South American government officials. One of the stories told brought in the name of King George of England, and this resulted in official protests by British diplomats both in Washington and in London.

Just what Senator Nye and his committee expect to do with the information they are gathering is not certain. There are suggestions of government ownership or at least government control of all war munition manufacturing and selling. Plenty of evidence was brought out to prove that the makers of these wares sell to both sides in warfare.

J. P. Morgan

IN the fifth installment of the senate banking committee on its stock market investigation internal revenue agents were charged with "laxity in enforcement" for accepting, without examination, income tax returns prepared by J. P. Morgan & Co. The committee presented a long review of evidence that officials of the Morgan company, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the National City bank of New York "avoided" income taxes by "a variety of methods."

"Many returns, particularly of partners in large banking houses, were exempted from adequate scrutiny," the committee said.

"When examinations were made the time devoted to them was comparatively short, in view of the wealth of the taxpayers and the complex nature of their transactions.

"Thus, in 1930, according to the bureau's own records, one day was spent in checking the partnership return of J. P. Morgan & Co. and Drexel & Co.—the most powerful banking group in the world.

"This return was not subjected to any field examination and apparently the agent's explanation was sufficient to satisfy the internal revenue bureau that none was necessary."

RECONSTRUCTION Finance corporation announced a new $100,000,000 corn loan program. Farmers will be offered loans on corn of any crop year at the rate of 55 cents a bushel by the Commodity Credit corporation, the RFC disclosed. The RFC has turned over $100,000,000 to the commodity corporation, which is really a branch of the RFC, for the carrying out of the program. States included in the new loan plan are Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Ohio, Minnesota, Nebraska, South Dakota, and Colorado.

SENATOR HUEY LONG won handily in his fight for absolute control of Louisiana, his candidates for congress, state supreme court and public service commissioner defeating those of the "old guard." The election was quite peaceful despite the predictions of bloody "civil war." The Kingfish is now expected to press his investigation of graft and corruption in the affairs of New Orleans and to undertake to have his arch enemy, Mayor T. Semmes Walmsley, ousted from office through action by the legislature, which he controls. Huey is now the virtual dictator of the state, but his opponents have not given up the fight.

NEW DEALERS rejoiced in the results of the Maine election, though their victory was incomplete. Gov. Louis J. Brann, Democrat, was re-elected by a substantial majority over the Republican candidate, Alfred K. Ames, a wealthy and aged retired lumberman. Senator Frederick Hale, veteran Republican, was returned to the upper house for his fourth term, but his majority over F. Harold Dubord, dynamic Democratic nominee, was so slender that Hale must have felt rather humiliated. The New Dealers won two of the three congressional seats.

William A. Comstock lost the Democratic nomination to succeed himself as governor of Michigan, being defeated by Arthur J. Lacey. The Republicans named Frank B. Fitzgerald, now secretary of state.

In South Carolina the textile strike injected itself into the election. In a runoff election Olin D. Johnston, union sympathizer and former mill hand, won the Democratic nomination over Cole Blease.

In Arizona the Democrats renominated Senator Ashurst and Congressman-at-large Isabella Greenway. The New Dealers tried to get the gubernatorial nomination in Colorado for Miss Josephine Roach, coal mine operator and social worker, but she was beaten by Edward C. Johnson, the incumbent. In Washington, also, the New Dealers lost out when J. C. Stephenson was defeated by Lewis Schwellenbach for the Democratic senatorial nomination.

QUARTERLY financial reports from the national committees show that between June 1 and September 1 the Republican receipts were $105,078 and the Democrats collected $121,088. Republican expenditures aggregated $149,920 and Democratic outlays were $106,337. The Republican deficit was fixed at $81,435, against Democratic unpaid obligations of $497,959.

Among the generous contributors to the Democratic fund were Col. Jacob Ruppert, George F. Trommer and William Piel of New York and Fred Pabst of Milwaukee, all identified with the brewing industry. Irenee and Lammot Du Pont and their associates gave largely to the Republican fund.

NATIONWIDE distribution has been started on a poster pledging the public to support Blue Eagle business establishments. Four inches square, it is gummed for pasting in windows. Code authorities and local NRA committees are counted upon to aid its distribution.

This agitation is to accompany the temporary internal reorganization of the recovery administration, as decided upon by President Roosevelt and Hugh S. Johnson, the NRA administrator.

Authority is to be split three ways instead of the present one-man control. General Johnson is expected to continue in an important post. Separate agencies will be in charge of policy-framing, administration, and deciding controversies.

IF YOU can believe the foreign office in Tokio, Japan is ready to scrap all powerful weapons of offense and is likely to propose, at the forthcoming naval reduction conference, the abolition of battleships and plane carriers.

"It is not Japan's intention to enter a naval competition which will result in an increase in armaments and heavier burdens for the people of the world," the foreign office spokesman said. "Our plan is to have a navy insufficient for offensive purposes but sufficient for defense. We hope others also will work towards this end."

WHEN the League of Nations met in Geneva an invitation to Russia to join the league was circulated, signed and sent to Moscow. The council then announced that an accord had been reached to grant Russia a permanent seat on the council, and it was expected that only Portugal and Argentina would continue to oppose this.

Richard Sandler of Sweden was elected president of the league assembly by an almost unanimous vote.

Poland gave a jolt to the league by announcing that it will no longer abide by the general treaty for the protection of minority peoples. Joseph Beck, foreign minister, told the assembly that until all states protect the rights of minorities Poland would refuse any control by an international organism of its treatment of minority groups.

FROM the American Federation of Labor comes a suggestion that the government create a "central agency, representing organized business, labor, consumers and the government, to lay out a production program and carry it through."

The 1933 legislature appropriated $37,207,000 for the present biennium, although the various departments had presented requests for a total of $44,793,000, from which more than $8,000,000 was cut by the budget commissioner.

The results showed that No. 574 will represent employes in 37 per cent of the firms. In the other 63 per cent it failed to gain control of the representation because of selection of other representatives or the votes, or because employes in various firms cast no ballots at all.

PONZI NOW FREE, DEPORTATION IS CONFRONTING HIM

Governor Cold to Plea That He Be Pardoned So He Can Remain.

New York.—America hasn't been kind to Charles Ponzi.

Maybe it's because John Law has too long a memory and can't take the famous crook seriously when he says America is his only home and he loves it. The only answer Governor Ely, of Massachusetts, made to that remark, when Ponzi filed a plea to remain in the United States now that his jail sentence is over, was a fistful of deportation papers.

Ponzi, you remember (as if anyone could forget it) was the fantastic confidence man who mulcted a gullible public of $9,000,000 by the most harebrained scheme ever conceived. He promised investors 50 per cent profit within forty days. They got it, too. He gave the earlier investors 50 per cent profit by drawing it from the later investors. It was as simple as that. Of course, the pyramid couldn't go on growing indefinitely, and when it toppled Ponzi faced a 14-year sentence.

Back to Italy.

That was in 1920. Now he wants to stay in the country he's called home for the last 32 years. Governor Ely granted him a hearing on his petition to wipe out the stigma of a state prison sentence, obtain a full pardon, and thus, so he believes, avoid deportation. But he was turned down. That still leaves him the choice of appealing to the federal courts. And after that—back to his native Italy, from which Mussolini has distinctly requested that he be kept away. A man without a country who carries a reputation as one of the biggest crooks this country has ever known is in a tough spot.

Ponzi's brilliant idea burst upon him one day when he was working as an office boy in a broker's office. He set himself the crazy goal of pyramiding a 5-cent international postal coupon into millions. He did just that within a few weeks.

Lived Expensively.

As soon as the sensation wore off investors began to be a little nervous about sending more money, and when it came time to pay off the later investors Ponzi didn't have the money. He lived in a million-dollar mansion, operated a number of expensive cars, showered jewels and furs on his wife, and was one of the flashiest spenders Broadway has seen in ages.

He would invest his client's money in Florida real estate and then proceed to pyramid it. He would sell a lot to one investor for $15. It would be resold for $25, then $100, then $150. It had no value whatsoever save the prospect of a buyer. For a while the Ponzi investors received huge dividends. A famous Wall Street banker hailed Ponzi as a genius and offered him $10,000,000 for his secret.

In 1920 they put Ponzi under arrest, but didn't prosecute his pretty wife, who, by the way, was waiting for him when he got out. He served a term in a federal prison, was rearrested and sent to jail in Plymouth, Mass., as a "common thief." Ponzi investors still receive 37½ per cent of their investments every Christmas, but that's only because those who made huge profits were forced to return them.

Harpooned Fish Buries Sword in Ocean Floor

Yarmouth, N. S. — Capt. Frank D'Eon, who came to port with 54 swordfish from George's bank, told of encountering a fighter of the deep that "couldn't take it."

On board the Seretha, the crew harpooned a big swordfish which, crazed with pain, drove full speed into the ocean floor, burying its sword to the eyes.

The fishermen said that the fish headed away with the harpoon line so fast that the gunwale smoked. It took a full hour to dislodge the dead sworder from the bottom and when the crew pulled it aboard it was "muddy clear to the eyes." Its weapon had been broken off by the impact.

On the same voyage the crew sighted a huge turtle about 6 feet in length and weighing probably 1,000 pounds.

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a faculty position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer meets Prof. Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy. At the railroad station they meet Mrs. Denver, engaged as matron. At the school the group is struck by an air of mystery pervading the place. Gordon Haskell, proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne completes the Academy faculty. In a schoolroom Janet finds a group which the teachers had supposed were scholars, are wax figures. Haskell explains the unusual circumstances connected with the conduct of the Academy. Among the pupils is Berenice Bracebridge, daughter of the late owner of the school. The story of the tragedy of Lostland Academy is that of two sisters and two brothers of Berenice, who lost their lives in the water, at the same moment, some years ago.

"Strange! Strange!" Payne muttered. "It's a marvel to me that Berenice Bracebridge has emerged so sane and sweet from such congeries of circumstances—that dreary pile, that strange guardian, a tragedy in her background, if not in her life."

On the other side, Arthur left them rather abruptly. "I'm not going in just yet. I'll see you at dinner." He strolled around a while, visited the little graveyard, finally leaned up against a tree and regarded the old academy, from whose cupola high above the eaves it was probable that no bell would sound again. No sign of life was about it—no light shone forth from door or window. Its secret—whatever it was—seemed locked in its ancient heart.

His thought drifted to the figures. He meant to see where they were kept; he wanted to examine them closely.

He looked about him—a basement ran under all the house, its windows facing a stone retaining wall which at one spot was broken to admit of steps going down. Arthur, examining them, saw that they led to a door which was half ajar; a door hanging by one hinge and badly in need of paint. Green moss blanketed the steps and muffled Arthur's footsteps. Squeezing through the narrow aperture the door's sagging position offered, he found himself in a dismal passage from which opened rooms. Cautiously opening several doors, he saw rooms of a depressing aspect—dark, moldy, the plaster or paper falling from the walls. One proved to be an abandoned kitchen with the great range of an antique pattern rusting away in its frame of black-painted bricks. A marble pastry table had become so yellow and discolored that it suggested a kind of diseased stone. A bucket under it, covered with dried-up red paint, did not seem a cheerful object. An old, rusty frying pan lay disconsolately in one corner.

He went on hurriedly—and finally came to the room which he sought. It had been used, it was evident, at one time, as a supplementary schoolroom, for a blackboard covered one of the walls behind the old-fashioned teacher's desk. On it in freshly-written letters made by red chalk were four names.

Jethro Bracebridge, Jr.
Althea Bracebridge.
Norman Bracebridge.
Isabel Bracebridge.

He saw these names as he entered. The next moment he started violently. The four wax figures in the fading light were so real that he imagined for a minute that he had blundered into an actual study hour. Then their preternatural stillness told him that he had found the hiding place of the dummies. Janet had been quite right—they were beautifully done—the flesh tint quite natural, the grave, sweet, brooding faces of the little girls as absorbed as if some lesson of a long-ago spring had continued over the years an eternal problem. Their soft, abundant golden hair moved a little in the draught which drew in from the half-opened door. He put a finger against one curl, then quickly raised it; as if a thrill of life had been communicated. Arthur watched each figure in turn as if a danger existed, that to cease to look at one of them was to incur a harm from the rest. He jumped! Had one moved! "But I'm a fool," he commented. "The first time in my life I ever had nerves."

The golden hair on one of the figures stirred softly in the draft. He bent to look at the eyes, almost expecting to see the lashes quiver; then glanced up, and this time a kind of paralysis kept him from showing the emotion he felt. In the doorway stood an immensely tall man. Two piercing eyes regarded him from a putty-pale face. The man made no sound, but after a prolonged scrutiny turned and went down the passage.

Again he heard steps in the passage, but they were light, like those of a woman. Berenice appeared in the doorway.

"Balder told me you were looking at the figures. I came to tell you it is not the best thing to do!" she said in her gentle voice, her beautiful eyes regarding him gravely.

"I am sorry if I have done anything out of the way or anything to hurt you, Miss Bracebridge. I admit I yielded to my curiosity."

"It doesn't hurt me," she answered. "But my guardian becomes very much disturbed if people look at the figures."

"Did he—have these figures made?"

"Oh, no! But he will tell you himself."

"I am glad you cautioned me about these figures—"

"Oh, I like you all—I want you to stay!"

"I am glad of that. I hope you will know Miss Mercer better. She is very lovely."

"I quite agree with you! They have not always been lovely."

"You mean the teachers—governesses?"

"Yes, and usually when they found out about these figures they went away. They—they were afraid of them."

"Of their strangeness, perhaps?"

"Yes—and the servants are the same way—except Balder."

"Who is Balder?"

"The very huge man. He came to work for my father years ago; and father jestingly called him 'Balder the Beautiful,' from Matthew Arnold's poem, I suppose. He is very ugly, but he is a strong man to have around the place. And he doesn't mind the figures. But the country people around here do. Did you see some of the pupils watching the corridors?"

"Yes, I noticed it."

"There's a queer, superstitious tradition in the mountains that the figures are really alive. No one, I suppose, actually believes it, but no servant will go down the corridor when they are kept after dark." She paused; then said: "Tell me, did you know Mr. Payne before you came here?"

"No."

"He has eyes that look straight through one."

"I am sure he is a good psychologist."

"I am sure of it, too. When I know him better I shall ask him—many questions."

"May I ask you one?"

"Certainly."

"Why were you on that dangerous cliff path this afternoon? It was comparatively safe where we were—there's a bank; but you had nothing but air between you and that frightful whirl. I was afraid you would venture down to the little platform—the little stone ledge overhanging the whirl."

She shivered. "Oh, no; they fell from there!"

"Poor children! Were there no witnesses?"

"Yes—an old farmer coming up on the other side to fell a tree—he heard them shout and saw them just as they plunged in, their arms raised trying desperately to regain their balance. Then they all went down. Father was in such agony of mind because he had detained Mr. Haskell from going along with them to curb their adventurous spirits; he wanted Mr. Haskell to take down dictation, and they were shut up on the library all afternoon. Then came a knock on the door. It was Balder to say that while he was working in the vegetable garden a farmer, white as death, had rowed across the lake in the twilight to tell of the accident. He cried like a child, could only cry out for a while: 'Doctor Jethro! My God! I could not help them. I was on the other side.'"

"The farmer's name?"

"Jerry Moore. He lives about a mile from here, all alone; his people have all died."

"He's trustworthy?"

"Jerry? Oh, yes! yes. And he adored my brothers and sisters. They were so gay and friendly with every one."

"Was there ice forming at the time? Could they have slipped on that?"

"It was too early for ice. No, Isabel went too near, lost her balance, I suppose, fell, and dragged the others down."

"Then—the figures—were made—"

"Ah, please! He will tell you about these."

Her eyes softened as she looked at them; and he thought of a day when she would be much older than the ages represented by these mannequins; and down the long avenue of time she would still perhaps see her lost brothers and sisters in their eternal adolescence; and keep them in a playground of memory from which they could never emerge adult and weary. Her own brilliant beauty had an element in it which he felt would be there through all her life—the indestructible element of the soul.

"Shall I shut the door?"

"Yes; you see, there's a small circle of glass let into it—so Mr. Haskell can look in—and see that they are right—and in their places."

"But why look in—why have them around at all?"

"It was a clause in father's will," she said. "It needn't be—after I am twenty-one. Oh, Mr. Haskell will tell you."

They shut the door quietly as if not to disturb those waxen scholars, and down the corridor they went together. At the foot of the staircase leading to the main hall she left him.

Arthur, full of his story, sought out Wilton. He ran him down at last in the library. The vast place was illuminated only by a kerosene lamp, in whose circle of light Wilton was examining some books.

"Hello, old fellow!"

"Hello, boy! Well, what have you found out? I can tell by your manner that you have discovered something."

"I've been talking to Berenice."

Wilton looked up jealously. "Where did you see her?"

TO BE CONTINUED.

Urges Painless Doing Away With the Unfit

Sir Buckston Browne, the great surgeon, speaking at the annual dinner of the Harveian society, pleaded that the power to give incurable sufferers happy release, power to decide that a congenitally insane or deformed baby should not live should be given into the hands of a joint council of doctors and lawyers, says a cable from London.

He said that he looked forward to a time when the medical profession should have the power of sentencing to death those who are not fit to live, either from disease or crime, and of granting permits to the old and wornout who wish to go to the lethal chamber. Sir Buckston is eighty-four, and has been a surgeon for 60 years.

"When I was a young man," he said, "the human body was regarded as a vile and unspeakable thing. Pain and disease were punishments for the original sin of Adam and Eve, and therefore it was immoral to administer chloroform to women in childbirth. Thanks to Charles Darwin, all that changed by slow and difficult degrees, until the body ceased to be an abomination and came to be regarded as nature's finest product.

"As we learned how to treat it, so we learned how to reverence it. When I began practice doctors were all laughing at the freakish ideas of Joseph Lister. At that time I knew there were certain beds in my hospital which meant certain death to any patient—they were so hideously septic.

"I have seen the advancement of science. I have lived into an age in which the machine has been made to outstrip the human body, so that it is becoming our urgent duty to accord to the body the same scientific attitude of mind as we grant to our machines. But we spend thousands and thousands on asylums for congenital, incurable, hopeless idiots, poor creatures whose miserable existences monopolize the working lives of expert nurses, and we do, officially, all that we can to prolong the sufferings of poor old broken-down bodies.

"I should not care to say how many cases I have known of doctors who have bravely taken the law into their own hands, who have helped old people to an easy way out of life, who have taken steps that monstrous and idiot babies should never live.

"And I say that it is time that the law should come to our aid and relieve us of this responsibility. A sufficiently responsible council should be able to accord the boon of a painless death. I think that as a first step, a council with this end in view might be formed immediately. It should contain both doctors and lawyers, the lawyers to insure that there should be no crimes committed by persons who want to be rid of aged relatives.

"The clergy could have no place on the council, I feel. It is for science to keep the body up to what is expected of it. The danger, in this age, is that the brain may run away from the rest of the body, and that we shall not select and improve the human body as Darwin taught us we should, and as we select and improve our machines."—Philadelphia Inquirer.

CLIMATE NOT A BIG FACTOR IN COLD 'CATCHING'

It's just as easy to catch cold in California as in Boston; just as easy to start sniffling in New Orleans as in Chicago, believes the Public Health Service.

Climate apparently makes no difference in the ease with which people take cold or the number of colds they have each year, it is concluded by the Service after a statistical study of colds and related diseases in various sections of the country.

Only one apparent connection between weather and colds was discovered. That was regarding temperature. It was found that the colder the weather, the more colds people seem to have. This was found to be especially true in the fall. Whenever there was an increase in colds and related illnesses, weather bureau records showed there was a drop in temperature during the same period.

Other features of climate and weather seemingly have no effect on the frequency of colds. The humidity, or amount of moisture in the air, the amount of sunshine and cloudy weather, rain or snowfall, and calm or windy weather do not affect the population's coughs and snuffles.

The Public Health Service's study of colds was made in six cities declared to represent "the extremes of latitude, longitude and climatic conditions within the continental United States." These cities are Boston, Columbus, Ohio, Washington, Chicago, New Orleans and San Francisco.

Students in universities in each of the cities provided the data on colds by reporting every two weeks on the number of colds and related ailments they had in the meantime. Besides colds, this included bronchitis, tonsilitis, sore throat, influenza and pneumonia, as well as combinations of these diseases.

Eruptions on Scalp Itched and Burned

Healed by Cuticura

"My sister's skin became itchy and, before long, sore eruptions began to appear on her face and scalp. They were red and soon began to weep. We thought she would have to have her hair cut and be bald. Her scalp itched and burned, causing her to irritate it by scratching.

"She began to use Cuticura Soap and Ointment. The first week the eruptions became fewer and in two weeks she was healed and no sign of her trouble can be seen." (Signed) Mrs. Emma Youska, 706 Monterey St., McKeesport, Pa., April 12, 1934.

CAMAY

FREE for a Short, Simple Letter about CAMAY

$1,000 EVERY YEAR OF YOUR LIFE!

AND 553 GENEROUS CASH PRIZES

IN every section of the country, good-looking women use Camay. It's the finest beauty soap made, they say. It's so delicate on the skin, so mild, and so generous of lather.

But we want 2,000,000 more women to use Camay. And that is why we planned this amazing Prize Contest!

$1,000 a Year—Think What It Would Mean!

Just imagine! $1,000 a year every year of your life! $1,000 a year with which to buy the things you've always wanted! 553 other marvelous cash prizes!

Dreams come true, if you win. Smart clothes—a vacation—a new car—a cruise around the world!

Here Is What You Do!

Try Camay. After you've cleansed your face and hands with it several times you'll know why it is the favorite beauty soap of so many thousands of women. Notice how quickly Camay lathers—how refreshed it leaves your skin.

Then, on a plain piece of paper, write your reasons for liking Camay. Mail it to us at once, together with 3 green and yellow Camay wrappers, or 3 copies of the wrapper drawn by yourself.

Remember—you don't have to be an expert writer to enter this contest. Any woman who really likes Camay may be a winner. 554 prizes—all to be paid to women like yourself. So just tell us, as simply, as briefly as you would tell some woman friend "Why Camay is the Best Beauty Soap for My Skin."

100 EXTRA PRIZES for QUICK ACTION

If your entry is received between Sept. 15th and Sept. 30th, 1934, it may be awarded one of the special prizes of $10 to be given for each of the 100 best letters received during this period. Winning one of these prizes will not in any way affect your opportunity for winning one of the 554 regular prizes.

Safetygrams BY FRED W. BRAUN The Safety Man

Who wants to be a road hog? No one will answer that in the affirmative and yet how many times have you seen drivers on the road feel that three-quarters of the road belongs to them and that three-quarters starts from the direct center.

This type of driver is not only dangerous to other people, but is a menace to all concerned including himself, life, and property. He obstructs the view of those behind him, slows up the line of traffic, and doubles the hazards on curves and hills.

This type of driver should be taken off our highways. If sound reasoning and safety education cannot do it, then police powers should remove him before serious damage to life and property is done.

To Reorganize Farm Bureau

Plans for the reorganization of the Marshall County Farm Bureau and the completing of the re-establishment of permanent agricultural extension services for the county were discussed at a meeting held at the court house last Thursday evening.

C. L. McNelly, assistant state county agent leader, addressed those present and explained the general set-up and program of agricultural extension services as carried on in seventy counties in the state at the present time. Mr. McNelly emphasized particularly the services which the extension offices were rendering in connection with carrying out the present nation-wide program of American Agriculture.

A. G. Mereness of the Minnesota Farm Bureau was present and discussed plans for membership and organization work in the county. Mr. Mereness pointed out that the Farm Bureau program not only includes agricultural extension service, but that Farm Bureau also has a very definite marketing, surplus control, legislative, taxation and refinancing program. The work of the Minnesota Farm Bureau in our state legislature and of the American Farm Bureau at Washington was cited as an illustration of the strength and effectiveness of Farm Bureau.

Mr. Mereness mentioned a number of benefits accruing to Marshall county in restoring Farm Bureau services to the county, among them being:

1. Properly consolidate the Agricultural interests and activities of the county.
2. Provide the necessary organization through which permanent agricultural extension work is carried on.
3. Establish a headquarters for Boys and Girls 4-H club activities
4. Make it possible for Marshall county to share in available state and federa funds.
5. Establish in Marshall county an organization of farmers that is for and back of the Agricultural Adjustment Program.
6. Give to Marshall county a voice in the program of organized agriculture in the state and in the nation.

A temporary executive committee was elected and delegated to complete and carry out plans for organization work in the county.

The committee consists of the following members:

Chairman, Carl Hjelle, Newfolden. Secretary, G. A. Sustad, Viking; Tom Howard, Warren; Victor Edman, Alvarado; Carl Olson, Argyle; John Gratzek, Strandquist; W. A. Holbrook, Grygla.

Advice of Inspectors
Quality is a very important factor in the production of cream, with inspectors inspecting all butter that comes on the market, for foreign matter such as flies and other things that may get into the cream, which may result in a total loss of some churnings. Let's all work hand in hand to prevent such happenings.

Five Weeks on Wheels

High Lights of An Auto Tour to the West Coast
by Hans O. Hanson

7. Carson City & Salt Lake City

Last week we left you at the California-Neveda state line. It was a very hot afternoon that we came gliding down out of the Sierra Neveda mountains to enter the state of Neveda about twenty-five miles southwest of old historic Carson City. We saw a lot of open country there which was dry as a bone and the only vegetation in sight was some sage brush and cactus.

We pulled into Carson City to stop a few hours as the heat had us pretty groggy by that time. They informed us that it was up to 114 in the shade there at two o'clock in the afternoon that day and, that the predictions were that it would hit 120 by 4 p. m. After a little rest we went to what was supposed to be the best restaurant in the Capitol city to have dinner. It was the poorest and highest price dump that we hit on the trip.

Carson City was a booming place in the early days when all kinds of mining was at its high peak in that country. They had a U. S. Mint there but, now it was closed down and they were digging in the yard back of it for the gold that had been carried out in the sweepings. At one time this capitol city had a population of twenty-five thousand people but now it had only two thousand inhabitants.

The governor and all other state officers lived in Reno only thirty miles away. The payroll in Carson City was $112,000 a month. This took care of the court house, capitol, state prison, indian school and state teachers college. The whole state has only 93,000 people living in it and of these Reno had 25,000.

We were told by one old man that they had great times around Reno in the early days. He had been at Body a small place that was up in a mountain peak over 11,000 feet above sea level. At the height of mining there they had ten thousand people and now not a soul remained there at what he called the end of the high hard pack trail. He said that when the word was passed around that the mother lode had given out there and, that rich strikes were made in California, everybody left the place in forty eight hours and went west.

Houses, stores, saloons ond other buildings were left with the furniture and stocks in them as it was cheaper to buy where you come than to try and pack it out on mules from the high rough mountains. He said that when a rich druggist pulled out, he asked him if he was not going to take his large cash register and, to his surprise the druggist then showed him that he not only was leaving the register but, he also left twenty dollars in change in it for the ghosts. They locked all the buildings and hung the key on a nail by the door. It was a code those days that said no one should go back to a deserted mining town.

This man said he went there twenty years later and found half of everything gone except the grand pianos of which there were only three and they were all left. A good road 14 miles away he said, had let too many souvenir hunters in there. A lot of them had gone to Body only to get a little of the whiskey that was left in the saloons.

Some of the high-light in this little town were: Eggs sold for $1 a piece, a rough bed brought $5 a night and wages in those days were $20 a day. They had a lot of hot times in the old town too and, shooting from the hip was not forbidden.

From Carson City we headed northeast for Utah. We missed Reno on account of road construction. We drove to Lovelock a 110 away by night. The heat there on the open desert was bad and as we could not sleep, we had coffee and got set for an all night drive as it was better to cross the dry deserts while the sun was hidden. It so happened that the moon shone bright and we got a dandy view of the mountains and valleys thru which we traveled. We also drove close to some of the deserted ghost town on the bleak sage brush covered desert.

After an all night drive of over 300 miles with a stop now and then for a little lunch and some gas, we arrived at the town of Vendover, Utah. Coming down the east side of the Pequop mountains at elevation of 4327, we got our first glimpse of the Great Salt Late Desert.

We struck out over the large salt beds for Salt Lake City a 130 miles away. It seemed funny to see nothing but salt on both sides of the road for over sixty miles. The state maintained a swell oiled highway across the salt desert. Some places were signs telling that the salt was four to six feet deep and white as snow. There were several refineries running out there now.

Arriving at Salt Lake City in the forenoon, we were glad to get to a shady tourist park and get rested up. The heat was boiling everything around there at that time of the day. We got all steamed up over the wonderful lay of that beautiful city. It had such nice buildings, wide streets and elaborate street lighting system. We visited the big state capitol and the Mormon tabernacle.

The Mormons took us on a lecture tour thru the assembly, tabernacle and the grounds and also explained the sacred temple.

We were told by a Mormon that any nationality could belong to their church. He said they called themselves the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. They sure had a swell lay-out in that city and, although we did not believe as they do, we admired their generous hospitality.

We visited the beautiful state capitol and many other points of interest in the city and found the people very anxious to show us around and make us feel that we were welcome. Of the one hundred and forty thousand people living in this city, about sixty per cent were Mormons.

Salt Lake had dried up pretty much in the past four years and had now shrunk back over two miles from its original shoreline. Its water level had dropped nine feet and it was so salty now that the water was 38 percent solid. One had a heck of a time to try and swim in it but, you could sit in the water and float around.

Next week we take you from Salt Lake City thru Wyoming.

Given Wedding Reception

A host of friends and relatives of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Sandberg gave them a wedding reception in the Nazareth Lutheran Church basement on Friday evening. The evening was spent playing games after which the self invited guests served a bouuteous lunch.

The newlyweds were given many useful and beautiful gifts as a remembrance of the occasion

Mr. and Mrs. Emil Felske and family of Lsckhart, Mr. and Mrs John Heldstab and family of Crookston, were Sunday visitors at the Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Holst home. Irene Holst accompanied them to Crookston to attend her her school duties at the A. C.

Once our county was nearly bankrupt, but today we are in good financial situation; we pay cash as we go on every fund except the poor fund, and it will not be long before we pay cash as we go on that fund. Our 1935 tax year should show a considerable decrease in county tax. I am greatly interested in the welfare of our county and its people, and I would like to continue working for the county and its people for another term.

Northwest School Opened

The fall term at the Northwest School opened this week with registration on Monday, and the first classes held on Tuesday morning. Preliminary announcement made by Registrar Mlinar indicate the highest enrollment in four years. The final enrollment figures will not be available until next week as a number of young men and women have been required to assist with some of the fall work at home.

New faculty members include Victor C. Kallal, graduate of the University of Illinois, who replaced S. A. Anderson as instructor in gas motors and supervisor of the Senior boys' dormitory, and Miss Dorothy M. Smith of Wisconsin, graduate of the OshKosh Teachers' College, Wisconsin, with master's degree from the University of Minnesota, who succeeds Mrs. Cynthia Hauglund as head of the English department.

Special fall term activities include Home Comin Day, October 20, at which time the Morris Aggies will meet Coach Christgau's team on the home campus; Parent's Day, November 3; Thanksgiving, November 29; and the close of the fall term Dec. 21.

At the opening faculty meeting Supt. A. A. Dowell announced faculty committee assignments for the fall term. Committee chairmen briefly summarized the work of their respective committees, including R. S. Dundam, Entertainment committee; E. R. Clark, Student's Work Committee; T. M. McCall, Athletics; and J. W. Mlinar, Scholarship.

Orvis Mickelson, who spent the summer months with his grandparents Mr. and Mrs. Louis Wegge, left last week for Crookston to visit with his uncle and aunt Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Carlson for a few days. From there he will go to Leeds, N. D. to join his mother and sisters and, where he will go to school this winter.

H. Moberg purchased a Chev. truck in St. Paul last week.

The Reason Why - -
The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.
For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.
If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

Lindbergh Baby Kidnaping Brought Near Solution by Arrest—President's Board Offers Plan for Settling the Textile Strike.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

WITH the arrest of Bruno Richard Hauptmann in New York city, the government agents and state police appeared to be well on the way toward solving the Lindbergh baby kidnaping and murder mystery. The prisoner, a German alien thirty-five years old, was nabbed after he had given to a filling station man a $10 gold certificate that was found to be part of the ransom paid the kidnapers by Dr. John F. Condon—"Jafsie"—over a cemetery wall in a vain attempt to get the baby returned. In Hauptmann's garage in the Bronx the police found $13,750 which also was identified as part of the $50,000 Jafsie had paid. Then circumstantial evidence rapidly was gathered to prove Hauptmann was one of the guilty men, and he was partially identified by Doctor Condon, as well as by a taxi cab driver who said the prisoner was the man who gave him $1 eleven days after the kidnaping to carry a note to Jafsie.

Officials of the department of justice announced that Hauptmann's handwriting tallied with that of ransom notes sent by the kidnapers.

Police Commissioner John F. O'Ryan, who made the official announcement of the developments jointly for New York and New Jersey authorities as well as for the federal Department of Justice, declared that Hauptmann admitted under severe questioning that he had been employed as a carpenter near the Lindbergh home at Hopewell.

O'Ryan also asserted that police had established that Hauptmann had had access to the lumber yard in which lumber was found bearing a peculiar mark, similar to that found on the ladder left at the scene of the kidnaping. Hauptmann, he added, is in this country illegally. He is married and has a ten-year-old son.

Colonel and Mrs. Lindbergh, who were in Los Angeles, were said to have known in advance that the arrest was expected. They secluded themselves and would say nothing for publication.

FEDERAL JUDGE W. CALVIN CHESNUT of Baltimore handed down an opinion holding that the farm moratorium amendment to the federal bankruptcy act passed by congress last June is unconstitutional. This amendment, known as the Frazier-Lemke law, authorizes debt-ridden farmers to go into federal courts and reduce their obligations. The judge held that it violates the rights of creditors as outlined in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution and that it seeks to supersede the rights of state courts.

The court pointed out that each state has laws to protect both the creditor and the debtor. The Frazier-Lemke act, it was stated, wiped away the safeguards for creditors and amounted to confiscation of property.

Gov. Winant

PEACE in the textile industry was almost in sight after the President's special mediation board reported to him its plan for ending the bloody strike that has been going on for weeks. The report was carried to Mr. Roosevelt at Hyde Park by Secretary of Labor Perkins and Gov. John G. Winant, chairman of the board. It proposed the following four point program:

1. Appointment by the President of a textile labor relations board of three members to settle all questions of union recognition at the several textile mills and to handle all other employer-employee disputes in the industry.

2. An investigation by the Department of Labor and the federal trade commission of the textile industry's ability to meet the higher wage payments which the union is demanding.

3. A moratorium on the "stretch-out" system, whereby, the union claims, employers are adding to the work load of their employees; during the moratorium the textile labor relations board shall appoint a textile work assignment control board to plan a permanent control of the stretchout.

4. An investigation by the Department of Labor into the various classifications of work in the textile industry and the wage scale for each classification.

President Roosevelt was highly pleased with the 10,000-word report of the board and expressed his hope that it would show the way to end the strike. F. J. Gorman, leader of the strike, submitted to the union's executive council the question of having the workers return to the mills pending final arrangements.

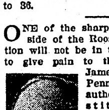
Immediately preceding these developments the mills had been reopening under military protection, and in consequence the strikers had resumed their acts of violence. There were numerous bloody encounters between them and National Guardsmen in New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Georgia and the Carolinas. In Connecticut the disorders abated and the state troops were being demobilized.

Carrying out his plans for extending the strike to all branches of the textile industry, Gorman sent out orders for 20,000 dyers to quite their jobs.

The union workers were still enraged at Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, NRA administrator, for his attack on the strike at a meeting of code authorities in New York. He charged that the walkout was in "absolute violation" of an agreement made by the United Textile Workers with the government last June. This the union leaders flatly denied, and they demanded the resignation of Johnson. Gorman said:

"We will not join in submitting any issue to the NRA as long as General Johnson is administrator or occupies a position of determining influence in the recovery administration. We said he ought to resign and we meant it. Since that is our view, we could not join in any submission to the NRA while he has the power to make NRA decisions."

If present plans are carried out, a quarter of a million cotton garment workers will go on strike throughout the country on October 1. This strike is called, according to the union leaders, because the manufacturers refused to comply with NRA's order to reduce the weekly working hours from 40 to 36.



J. M. Beck

ONE of the sharpest thorns in the side of the Roosevelt administration will not be in the next congress to give pain to the New Dealers. James M. Beck of Pennsylvania, leading authority on the Constitution, has announced he will not seek re-election because congress has become "a rubber stamp." He had been renominated, but prefers not to run. However, the administration will not be relieved from his attacks, for he intends to continue them in the courts.

"I am not retiring from public life," Mr. Beck explains. "This is no time for any citizen to lessen his activities in defense of our form of government. I am retiring from congress because I believe I can help in this great cause more effectively in the federal courts, where I have practiced for more than fifty years, than in congress, where the minority is gagged and reduced to impotence.

"Our form of government can only be saved by restoration of the Republican party to power, and I hope with my pen and voice to serve that party as effectually in the ranks as in congress."

WISCONSIN'S state primary was especially interesting because of the fact that the Democrats polled the largest vote by a wide margin, the La Follette Progressives and the Republicans trailing. The Democrats re-nominated Gov. Albert G. Schedeman, vigorous supporter of the New Deal. He will be opposed by Phil La Follette, who received the Progressive nomination without contest, and Howard T. Greene, Republican, who defeated former Governor Zimmerman and J. N. Tittemore.

John N. Callahan, former national committeeman, was named for the senate by the Democrats, and John B. Chappelle was the unopposed choice of the Republicans. Senator Robert M. La Follette, Jr., was of course nominated by his new party.

RUSSIA was duly admitted to membership in the League of Nations, only three votes in opposition being cast, and then was given a permanent seat in the council of the league. Maxim Litvinov, Soviet commissar for foreign affairs, pledged his nation to work through the league for world peace.

Declaring flatly that Russia would give up no attribute of its social system, Litvinov warned the assembly that "peace and security cannot be organized on the basis of shifting sands and verbal promises." It should be established, he said, "that any state is entitled to demand reasonable security from its near and remote neighbors." This, however, should never be interpreted as distrust, Litvinov added.

Next day, after a debate on plans to end the war between Paraguay and Bolivia, spokesmen for Russia privately asserted that the danger of war in the Far East has lessened, relations between Japan and Russia having improved.

NOME, the once famous gold city of Alaska, lies in ruins, having been swept by flames with damage estimated at $3,000,000. Four hundred persons were rendered homeless, and most of the food supplies were burned up. Relief vessels with food and medical supplies were rushed to the place and there was no fear of shortage. The government at Washington granted $50,000 in direct assistance and planned other relief measures. The citizens were hurriedly procuring lumber and other materials in the hope of at least partly rebuilding the city before it is isolated by winter ice.

JAMES A. MOFFETT, federal housing commissioner, announced that on November 1 he would begin releasing funds for the construction of at least a million new homes.

Concerning the home modernization and repair phase of the program, the administrator declared that more than 1,000 communities have set up or are setting up committees to direct the program locally. He predicted that by Thanksgiving more than 5,000 municipalities will have established such committees.

Financial support, he said, has come from 7,000 banks, and such loans have been made in all states but three.

"From field reports we estimate that one million dollars a day of loans are being made under our plan; and from experience in past community modernization campaigns we are sure that double that amount of cash business is being done."

TOBACCO, which is the third largest crop in the United States, has always been without an organized futures market. But it has one now, for the New York Tobacco Exchange, Inc., on Broad street, has opened for business after two years of preliminary organization work in which the federal department of agriculture co-operated.

The contract basis is United States standard flue cured type 12, grade B4F. There are nine types and numerous grades deliverable under specified differentials under the form of contract that has been adopted. The unit of trading is 10,000 pounds and quotations are in cents and five one-hundredths of a cent per pound. Delivery points have been established to date at Norfolk and Newport News, Va., and Louisville, Ky.

NEW YORK'S city assembly has adopted a lottery scheme for the purpose of raising relief funds, a way having been devised to circumvent the law. The business men and the clergy are protesting violently.

PREMIER MUSSOLINI repeatedly asserts that Italy wants no more war, but he is taking no chances. In an order designed to make Italy an "armed nation," his cabinet has directed that all males above the age of eight and below thirty-three, shall receive military training.

At the same time it was revealed that Italy's farming industry will be brought into strong national organization under the corporative state system, to be inaugurated November 10.

The working class will be welded together in one group and the owner-manager class in another. The two classes will be united in the central corporations.

Two major national co-ordinating bodies have been created for the separate groups. These are the Fascist Confederation of Agriculturists, for the owner-managers, and the Fascist Confederation of Agricultural Workers.

If Italy does have a war in the near future, it is likely to be with Jugoslavia. Just now the two nations are quarrelling bitterly. Mussolini is especially vexed because Jugoslavia is harboring 2,500 Austrian Nazis close to the border and not curbing their plans for another putsch.

Archduke Otto

AUSTRIA is thoroughly aroused by seemingly authentic reports from Brussels that former Empress Zita intends to establish her residence in Austria, along with her eight children, including Archduke Otto, pretender to the thrones of both that country and Hungary. It was asserted that this Hapsburg family had been granted permission to return as plain citizens if Otto would promise not to seek in any way to bring about restoration of the monarchy.

Quite unofficially, it is said restoration of the Hapsburg monarchy would not be opposed by either France or Italy, but the British foreign office scouted the idea. The little entente nations would be strongly against it but might not hold the Vienna government entirely responsible.

In Vienna a spokesman for the foreign office said that the return to Austria of the Hapsburg family, even as private individuals, is "still impossible."

Some member of the Hapsburg family may be allowed to return to represent the family in the long pending lawsuit over the Hapsburgs' properties, he said, but this is not likely to be Archduke Otto, because of the danger that disturbances might result from his presence. Socialists and labor unions would surely start trouble.

C. A. COBB, chief of the cotton production section of the farm administration, announced that the third cotton "parity" payment due in December would be combined with the second rental payment and that both would be distributed in October. The total thus to be paid out will approximate $72,500,000.

Mr. Cobb said that tenants and share croppers had an interest in the "parity" payment and that to put off payment until December, the usual season for many tenants and renters to move to other farms, would cause unnecessary complications.

W. LAWSON LITTLE, a husky San Francisco youth, has accomplished the feat of capturing the British and American national amateur golf championships in one season. This has been done only twice before. Little easily defeated David Goldman of Dallas, Texas, in the finals of the national tournament at Brookline, Mass.

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a faculty position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer meets Prof. Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy. At the railroad station they meet Mrs. Denver, engaged as matron. At the school the group is struck by an air of mystery pervading the place. Gordon Haskell, proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne completes the Academy faculty. In a schoolroom Janet finds a group which the teachers had supposed were scholars, are wax figures. Haskell explains the unusual circumstances connected with the conduct of the Academy. Among the pupils is Berenice Bracebridge, daughter of the late owner of the school. The story of the tragedy of Lostland Academy is that of two sisters and two brothers of Berenice, who lost their lives in the water, at the same moment, some years ago. The wax figures were modeled in the likenesses of the four children, and Doctor Bracebridge's will provided that they must be preserved. Payne learns from Berenice that the uncouth giant whom Janet had seen with Haskell is named Balder, and is a valuable servant.

—10—

Arthur explained. He saw that Berenice's desire to ask Wilton questions gave the latter deep satisfaction. "I don't wonder she's nervous," he commented. "Perhaps Haskell will explain everything satisfactorily this evening. He doesn't seem to have nerves."

"Oh, yes, he has! He's afraid of those wax figures."

"I should think he would be. Always to me—and I'm rather a healthy specimen—there's something stealthy and idiotic about a wax figure—at once helpless and menacing. I don't blame him—but what I am curious to know is, why such properties have to be kept around when it would be so easy to dispose of them? Meanwhile I've made a discovery. On that shelf to the left under the encyclopedias I found these books—school books, some precious possessions, like 'Little Women' and 'Treasure Island,' 'Young People's Anthology of English Verse,' and similar works. On the fly-leaf in a round, boyish hand I read in one of them—wait—I think we'll not be disturbed. I'll fetch it."

He brought the book, an American History, turned back the fly-leaf, and Arthur, looking over his shoulder, read:

Lives there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said
This is my own—my native land?

Below was carefully written: "Yes, G. H.! His native country is Satan's. I wish he would go there, and not come back to plague us any more with his fancied learning. He made Althea cry this morning with his sternness about nothing. I hope he reads this. Then he'll know what we all think of him. N. B."

"I wonder if he ever read it?" Arthur commented.

"Not likely! The top of the book had the dust of years on it."

"Here's another book with a very clever caricature of Gordon Haskell drawn on the fly-leaf. It's signed quite boldly, 'Althea Bracebridge,' and has the legend written beneath: 'Art is truest to nature, then nature to Art.'"

"They must have been interesting children! With a sharp perception of character, Haskell told me to use the library freely; so that I had no compunction in looking at these books. In fact, I did not know I was coming upon anything significant but these testimonies to Haskell's unpopularity with the younger members of the family are significant—justifies our own feeling about him."

The dinner bell put an end to their conference. Janet and Mrs. Denver were coming down the hall. "We've been out," the latter said. "I can breathe better out there in the garden."

"But Mrs. Denver—"

She put her finger on her lips. Haskell was approaching.

"Ah, I'm glad to see you all alive and well. I am dining with you tonight, and I've asked Mrs. Denver to join us. I want to clear up the mystery I knew you would soon find out anyway—the mystery of the four wax figures. But we won't have it for a dinner topic."

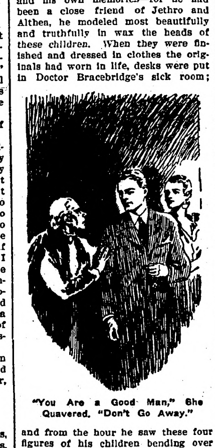
He led the way down the east wing to a rather stately room; probably once the dining room of the Bracebridge family. Its oak-paneled walls bore two portraits—one of a young woman walking in the grounds of Lostland academy, the other of the five Bracebridge children, with Berenice, a baby of two, on the grass at the feet of her sister Althea.

"The late Mrs. Bracebridge—the children," Haskell said briefly, and assigned his teachers places at the table. "I would have asked Berenice to come in—but she would not like to hear what I am to tell you. She adored her father. She was, you see, not quite thirteen when he died."

Payne looked wistfully at the portrait, as if to comfort himself with the thought that one at least of that group was still alive.

Dinner was quickly finished. Four people were too impatient to hear the story. Haskell began it quite informally, after having passed cigarettes. "Miss Mercer—or one of you—perhaps all of you had eyes keen enough to see the immobility of these scholars as we passed the schoolroom. They had no business there—rather, Balder had no business to put them there while he was cleaning the other room, and then forget them. But Balder is the kind of fellow who never does what he is told to do, except by accident, and really I hate to have those figures touched by profane hands. The originals were dear to me."

He paused, and seemed for a moment quite abashed in his own thoughts. "I told Mr. Payne the dreadful story of the accident, by which Dr. Jethro Bracebridge lost four children in one terrible casualty. He was in ill health at the time, and blamed himself for having me in the library with him taking dictation, thus preventing me from accompanying the children, as I had wished to do. His nervous condition soon resulted in a kind of brain fever, and his cries that his four children be brought again into his presence were pitiful indeed. We had at the time an advanced pupil whose work as a sculptor had already won recognition, and, oddly enough, he had begun his artistic career in a wax-figure studio, where the figures were made, all save the heads, which he felt more competent to do himself. Under my mother's guidance, with the aid of photographs and his own memories—for he had been a close friend of Jethro and Althea, he modeled most beautifully and truthfully in wax the heads of these children. When they were finished and dressed in clothes the originals had worn in life, desks were put in Doctor Bracebridge's sick room; and from the hour he saw these four figures of his children bending over their tasks apparently he began to improve; but his brain did not clear for many weeks. When it did, he would not have the figures destroyed—and he left a clause in his will that until Berenice was twenty-one the figures should be kept in one of the schoolrooms, that she might hold her lost brothers and sisters in her memory. Sometimes I think the poor doctor's brain was still slightly affected —or he never would have written down such a clause—but even the eccentric wishes of the dead should be respected."



"You Are a Good Man," She Quavered. "Don't Go Away."

There was silence for a moment or two after Haskell ceased speaking. Then Payne said: "After all, there is an end—a terminus to the conditions of the will; and then those memorials—may be destroyed. In fact, I think if they are proving detrimental to the success of the academy, to Miss Berenice Bracebridge's nerves—"

Haskell was alert in an instant. "Has she been talking to you?"

"Not to me—to Mr. Fleming. She confessed to him that she was afraid of the figures when not in the room with them; but close to them she had no fear."

Gordon Haskell's round, stubborn head, which had a curious look of being carved in wood, gave a jerk, and his bright eyes moved restlessly.

"Mr. Payne, you remember we discoursed upon the psychological bases of fear. I've often wondered whether the curious terror of those figures I have witnessed in more than one person may not have its origin in the fact that the four died together, and a father's pitiful and delirious grief had led to the construction of their images?"

"It may be, or it may be simply the fact that they are here—always here!"

Haskell gave a cry and put his hand to his heart, his face becoming blanched and terrible. In an instant he recovered himself. "An old trouble," he apologized with a smile. "I have a bad heart."

"I have not yet seen the figures close," Payne remarked. "Will you take me down to see them?"

Haskell stared at him angrily; then he muttered: "Well, I suppose until everyone's curiosity is fully satisfied there will be no peace. I have to give some orders to the men about tomorrow's work; so I'll call Berenice to take you into the basement."

Berenice soon appeared in the doorway. The draught moved the spun gold of her hair; she glanced toward Wilton Payne. Behind her, her cashmere shawl giving out a gleam of red where the light of the swinging lamp caught it, stood a bent old woman with a motherly, brooding face of affection. As Payne and Berenice passed her, she laid a hand on Payne's arm. "You are a good man," she quavered. "Don't go away."

A Pressing Matter

By EMELINE BOYER

"STAY where you are, Joie, and keep your hands in sight." Detective Big Jim Dunn halted the young man's nervous pacing. "We were anxious to see you," he went on in the same even voice; "so we got a pass-key from the janitor and came in."

Keeping a close watch on his host, Big Jim motioned to the two policemen behind him. While the one held a drawn revolver, the other ran his hands over Joie Ray's clothing. "No rod," he reported.

"We want you to come down to headquarters," said the detective.

"What for?" asked Joie insolently. "You've got nothin' on me."

"Too bad about Sol Moses," observed Big Jim. "He worked hard all his life, lived in two little rooms above his store, didn't even get glasses when he needed them. And now, when he'd put his boy through college and was gonna retire to the country, he gets bumped off on his way to the bank tonight." He paused, but Joie offered no comment. "Somebody was after his money, I guess," Big Jim continued, "but left without taking it, or his gun either. Maybe he was afraid that his shot had attracted too much attention."

"Whaddya tryin' to feed me?" asked Joie derisively. "The banks close at noon on Saturday."

"But the night depository doesn't," answered the detective.

Joie was unimpressed. "What do I care about Sol Moses and his chicken-feed?" he asked airily.

Big Jim's reply was a question. "What have you been living on since Louie was sent up the river?"

"Oh, I have an income," replied Joie, grandly.

"You wouldn't think an old fellow like Sol would put up a fight," remarked the detective.

If he expected a reply, he was disappointed. With a yawn that looked real, Joie observed, "Well, drop in again sometime—any time. I'm going to bed now."

"Since when do you go to bed at half past ten?" asked Big Jim.

"Is that what you wanted me to come down to headquarters to find out?" Joie inquired sweetly.

"No," said the detective. "We wanted to ask you where you were this evening."

"Right here," declared Joie flatly.

"Reading and smoking?" asked Big Jim.

"Reading," answered Joie; "but I've cut out smoking." His glance strayed over the empty ash trays.

The detective's eyes followed his.

"I thought you might like to see this," he said, taking from his pocket a piece of cloth—cheap, shoddy suit material. "It was in Sol's hand," he explained. "Somebody in the crowd said it matched a suit you've been wearing."

Big Jim did not need to take the word of some one in the crowd. The material matched the suit that Joie had on.

But Joie's smile remained idyllic. "I don't feel any draft," he remarked, "but pr'aps you'd like to take a look." He rose and insolently turned about.

"Look it over, boys," Big Jim ordered. The policemen did, thoroughly.

"Well, I guess we've drawn a blank," he observed. "But we'll take a look around before we go."

At the end of an hour, everything had been subjected to a close scrutiny, without result. But Big Jim was not through. "You boys stay here and keep your eye on Joie," he ordered. "I'll be back soon."

In less than ten minutes, Big Jim returned. "Too bad," he told Joie, "that the new janitor didn't keep the incinerator going. I found another pair of pants down there just like yours; only the other pair has a piece torn out."

Joie's calm was apparently unbroken. "So what?" he asked, rising and moving aimlessly toward Big Jim. But with a sudden motion his aimlessness disappeared. He leaped for the door.

The detective was too quick for him. With a flying tackle that would seem impossible for one his size, he brought Joie to the floor.

• • •

"Lucky there was a new janitor up there," observed one of the policemen to Big Jim, after Joie had signed a confession.

"Yes," replied Big Jim. "Joie wouldn't have believed me if I had told him that an old hand had forgotten the incinerator."

"Did the piece in Sol's hand just fit the hole in the pants?" asked the policeman.

"I don't know," was the reply.

"Didn't you try it?" The policeman was obviously shocked.

Big Jim reached in his pocket and pulled out a handful of twisted buttons.

"Here's what I found in the incinerator," he explained. "The janitor was right on the job."

"So it was a bluff," said the policeman admiringly. "But what made you think of a two-pants suit?"

"When Joie stood up for us to look him over," explained Big Jim, "I noticed that his pants were pressed, but that his coat was wrinkled. Just before I came on duty at six o'clock," he confessed, grinning, "my wife made me take off my coat and let her press it, because I looked the same way.

"I guess that's why they pay us only $160 a month on this job," he observed; "so that we have to buy two-pants suits."

Easy to Acquire Skill in Carving

Beginner, However, Will Be Interested in These Pointers.

To gain the skill acquired by a good carver, the person has to know how to cut meat to stress tenderness. Also there are certain other knacks or tricks, which a good carver learns, which are appreciated by those who are served, although they may not realize why their portions seem so well suited to their tastes. Points on poultry and bird carving are given today.

The position of a bird is, in itself, important. The legs should be at the right, the neck at the left. The fork is thrust through the breast, one prong each side of the breast bone. In this position the bird is held firmly and the knife most readily finds its way to sever the first and second joints and wings. The former are cut off together and then the leg (the first joint) is severed from the second joint. Then the wings are cut off, after which the breast is cut in thin slices.

Each portion should consist of some white and some dark meat, for no longer is it considered correct to ask which kind a person prefers. To get enough dark meat, which is the richer, to go with the white, which is the more delicate, it is necessary to cut the dark meat of the joints into pieces. One such piece, with a slice of breast, forms a good serving. It is only when meat is carved in the kitchen and passed for each person to help himself, that taking preferred portions is permissible. Then the entire bird is jointed and cut without such apportionments. The breast is not sliced but is separated from the carcass in portions right for individual servings.

When there is stuffing, the carver slits the stitches of the sewing, and spoons out the tasty, well-seasoned crumbs, giving one spoonful, or its equivalent, with each serving. When the bird is served jointed and cut, the dressing is apt to form a center, of many portions, with the meat about it. Roast birds are apt to be carved at the table, or the portions be on the plates put before those dining when this course is served.

The term bird is used to include chicken, fowl, turkey and the usual kinds of birds which are not so small that they are served whole, or in halves, as individual portions.

Onion Soup — Viola!

TWO hundred years or so ago, French peasants discovered how to make a most savory soup—onion soup, with the tang of cheese and hot beef broth poured over sizzling onions. Years later gourmets and the gay throngs from the Paris cafes and the Opera discovered how good it was. Recently—and this is the big news for most of us—canners have discovered how to put this French onion soup in cans!

Just as it used to be quite the thing to stop in Les Halles, the central market place of Paris, after a night of gaiety, and eat onion soup from French petites marmites, it is recently becoming quite the thing to invite the crowd to finish up the evening—or the night, as it may be—at your home and serve this colorful dish.

Under Kleig Lights

Hollywood is riding the crest of the onion soup wave with all the enthusiasm which it always accords to a new and delightful vogue. One night the famous Brown Derby restaurant served onion soup, and it was immediately hailed as the discovery of a new star. Lords and ladies of filmdom prevailed upon their expensive cooks to learn the art. Then a French chef stepped into the picture and created the popular canned onion soup.

The secret of the success of peasant onion soup is its absolute goodness. The secret of the success of this canned soup is the fact that this good peasant soup has not been changed. All the good homely things go into it that the peasant housewife put into her soup kettle—onions sliced and shredded into spoon-size curls and then French-fried in butter to a crisp golden brown. Next aged ripe-flavored Parmesan cheese and then a pint of rich beef soup stock. It is cooked in the can, and when you open the can you open the very kettle that the soup is cooked in.*

Electricity

No one knows just what electricity is. A general definition is that electricity is a material agency which, when in motion, exhibits magnetic, chemical and thermal effects, and which, whether in motion or at rest, is of such a nature that when it is present in two or more localities within certain limits of association a mutual interaction of force between such localities is observed. Investigations indicate that it is discrete or granular in natu and that there may be two kinds, tive and negative.

"Torque"

"Torque" to an automobile seems to be a mystery to many owners of cars. Webster's dictionary defines torque as "that which produces or tends to produce rotation or torsion." Not so clear. Maybe this less technical explanation would be a little easier to understand. Torque in an automobile motor is the result of the explosive power of the contents of a cylinder full of gasoline vapor being applied through the medium of a piston and connecting rod to turn the crankshaft.

Five Weeks on Wheels

High Lights of An Auto Tour to the West Coast
by Hans O. Hanson

8. Salt Lake City to Cheyenne

Last week we left you in that beautiful valley in Utah where the great city of Salt Lake City stands as a monument to those fearless, but ambitious pioneers, who went into the wild west in the early days. It was into this valley that Brigham Young led the Mormons on July 24th, 1847 after they had all been driven out of the states of Illinois and Missouri.

The Mormon religion or the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints as they call it, was organized on the sixth day of April, 1830, at Fayette, Seneca county, in the state of New York, and its history has been thrillingly eventful. There are still a number of features about the Mormons that are intereting. You have to give ten per cent of your yearly income to the church in order to be classed as a good faithful Mormon.

When we left Salt Lake City for Wyoming, we had to climb a pretty steep mountain just a few miles out of town. We made the hard climb thru the Emigration Canyon and the elevation there was 6970 feet above sea level. This was one of the steepest climbs we made on the way coming home and it was also one of the narrowest canyons that we had the pleasure of traveling thru in any mountains.

It was over these Wasatch Mountains that Brigham Young led the Mormons on a July morning eighty-seven years ago. We were told that when they came down thru Emigrant canyon with their Ox teams and stopped on the flat terrace on the west side of these mountains there was not much to see in the valley. The only living thing they saw in the valley of the Great Salt Lake was one giant cottonwood tree. They pulled up near it and and started to build what today is a great city and, when we left there we stopped on this mountain side and took a good look at the beautiful valley which is a man-made paradise.

It has thru these few years been settled with nice homes, thousands of acres of orchards and irrigated fields and many millions of beautiful trees. A lot of credit should go to Brigham Young for his master mind in planning so much of what was done to create such a lovely spot in Utah.

After we crossed the Wasatch mountains we slipped down thru Echo canyon and came into the city of Evanston, Wyoming, in the southwest corner of that state. At this point we were only two hundred miles straight south of the furthest south point that we crossed near the West Thumb of the Yellowstone lake in the Yellowstone National Park. Wyoming is a very beautiful state and, as you travel up and down its mountains and valleys, its sandy deserts and high plateaus, you get that feeling of freedom which only the great outdoors can offer man.

When we sit and think back over all the beautiful places and the vast room in which a person can be good, we can't figure out why so many go bad in this old world. Moving on we came to old Fort Bridger. There we also stopped and took a look at the many old relics kept there. At this place we saw one of those giant wagons that was used for hauling freight across the plains seventy-five years ago. It took ten good horses to move it when loaded and its capacity was approximately four ton and the wagon weighed two ton.

The ringwood on the wheels was four inches thick and six inches wide. It had a double set of tires, each a half inch thick, but the outer one was an inch narrower than the inner one. The rest of the wagon was of massive construction. Fort Bridger is well preserved and an old soldier keeps gaurd there to see that souvenir hunters don't walk off with the place. It was established in 1843.

The state of Wyoming is preserving all of its historic spots and natural scenery. They are putting up large signs along the highwas telling the traveling public where to find them and as to what they are. There is nothing so wonderful for anyone to see as those old historic places and to be there and turn over in ones mind visions of what had taken place at some of them.

After another seventy-five mile drive we came to Rock Springs, the location of the first rendevouz in the Rocky Mountains of white traders and trappers in 1824. Following the Northern Pacific Railway over the Aspen mountain and the Continental Divide, we arrived at Rawlins, Wyoming. At this place we were right between two very interesting places in that state.

One of them was Battle Lake to the south, where on its shores in 1879, as a member of the Professor Simon Newcome expedition, Thomas A. Edison, aided by the frayed ends of bamboo on his fishing rod, conceived the idea of a non-conductive, enduring carbon filament, resulting in the later perfection of his incandescent electric lamp. The other noted spot was north of us. Whiskey Gap, made historic through condemnation and destruction of an entire wagon train's supply of whiskey in the year 1862, by Major O'Farrell, commanding company "A", 11th Ohio cavalry. This was the first raid and prohibition enforcement put on record in the U. S.

There are thousandsd of old historic spots, markers, forts, and crossing to see in wonderful Wyoming. It seems that this state was the last of the wild and wooly west frontiers. It has the largest fossil fields in the world; has extensive archaelogical fields and is the greatest native home of wild animals. They do a lot of irrigated farming there as well as dry farming and the people seemed to be getting along quite well.

We spent one night in Laramie a very beautiful city and from there we hopped over to Cheyenne the capitol city. In Cheyenne we visited the most impartant places and institutions and made a long call at the big state capitol where we were taken up into the dome so we all got a grand view of the country about us.

While there we went into the Department of Commerce and Industry and there we met Charles B. Stafford who was at the head of this department. He spent two hours giving us first hand information about their state. We will give you more details next week.

Cardinals Won World Series

Completing the spectacular saga of the Deans with a history-making climax, the great Jerome Herman (Dizzy) Dean pitched St. Louis to the baseball championship of the world on Tuesday with a record shutout triumph, 11 to 0, as the Cardinal clouting crew slaughtered the pitching staff of the Detroit Tigers in as wild and riotous a finish as any world series has ever witnessed.

This made the third championship for the Cardinals in 9 years.

Once our county was nearly bankrupt, but today we are in good financial situation; we pay cash as we go on every fund except the poor fund, and it will not be long before we pay cash as we go on that fund. Our 1935 tax year should show a considerable decrease in county tax. I am greatly interested in the welfare of our county and its people, and I would like to continue working for the county and its people for another term.

The Reason Why - -

The reason why business concerns and individuals consider a Checking Account a necessity is that when a check is written and passed in payment it eventually returns as a complete record of the transaction. It indicates the date of payment, the amount paid, and to whom paid—and the payee's endorsement is legal evidence that payment has been received.

For safety and efficiency in handling both business and personal finances a Checking Account is a necessity. And there is no substitute for the CONVENIENCE of paying by check.

If you haven't a Checking Account at this bank already, we invite you to open one this week. Your check book is ready and waiting!

You will probably want to make this frock of a sheer cotton.

General Johnson Resigns and Richberg Rules the NRA—Textile Industry Board Named—The America's Cup Is Successfully Defended.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

Donald Richberg

GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON steps out of the picture and the NRA is turned over to Donald R. Richberg and other "left wing" members of the New Deal management. President Roosevelt announced the greater part of the reorganization plan for the national recovery body, naming first the policy making board, with Richberg as its chairman and Secretary Ickes, Secretary Perkins, Harry L. Hopkins and Chester Davis as members. A fifth member was yet to be selected, he to be the chairman of the new administrative board. Five other members of this latter body are S. Clay Williams, head of the Reynolds Tobacco company; Arthur D. Whiteside, president of Dun & Bradstreet; Sidney Hillman, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers; Leon C. Marshall, labor specialist; and Prof. Walton H. Hamilton of Yale. Two ex-officio members are Blackwell Smith, assistant general counsel of NRA, and Leon Henderson, chief of the NRA division of research and planning under Johnson.

The judicial branch of the NRA was still under consideration. Mr. Roosevelt indicated that its duties might be assigned to a special department of the Department of Justice.

The recommendations of the new policy making board are subject to the will of the President, but under the terms of the executive order these recommendations must be submitted to the President by the director. Thus, Richberg will have the final voice before the President himself approves or disapproves the board's decisions.

The board was further empowered to "promulgate administrative policies, to appoint, to employ, discharge, fix the compensation, define the duties, and direct the conduct of the personnel necessary for its administration, and to exercise all those powers heretofore conferred by executive orders upon the administrator for industrial recovery."

RESIGNATION of General Johnson, as accepted by the President, is not effective until October 15. Until then he will be busy compiling his final report and also, it is said, writing the story of his life. It was learned that he has been offered the management of industrial and labor relations of "a large group of midwestern manufacturers."

This is not the time or place to estimate General Johnson's achievements as administrator of the NRA which was largely his own creation. He certainly worked hard and accomplished much, whether for good or evil. His mistakes were admittedly glaring, and not the least of them was his recent assertion that during his administration he had been in close touch with Justice Brandeis of the Supreme court. As that tribunal will have to pass on the constitutionality of NRA before long, this statement created a sensation and was dismaying to the friends of Justice Brandeis. Of course, the jurist could take no notice of it. The "low down" is said to be that Johnson did consult the justice when he was formulating the NRA and received some informal advice which he disregarded, and that later Mr. Brandeis told him he had better resign.

ORGANIZED business and the President are not at all satisfied with each other. Business leaders are nervous, and Mr. Roosevelt feels that they have too many "inhibitions" and are not doing what they should to aid recovery. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States, seeking a clear statement of the President's future intentions, sent him a list of questions on expenditures, budget balancing, currency stabilization and the government's part in business, politely requesting categorical replies. Mr. Roosevelt received the questionnaire with a smile and a joke, and there was no indication of his intention to answer it.

It was revealed in Washington that the President also received not long ago a set of resolutions adopted at a secret meeting of 120 leading industrialists and financiers. These men asserted that the policies of the New Deal, along with the uncertainties of the future, are throttling economic recovery in the United States. The resolutions were not intended for publication and the President made no mention of them in his press conferences.

Still another hard rap at the New Deal came in the form of a statement by the federal advisory council, composed of leading bankers. It was contained in a set of recommendations for the federal reserve system and severely criticizes the administration's monetary and economic policies, demanding a return to what the council considers sound principles.

The federal advisory council is a statutory body created by the federal reserve act to advise the federal reserve board concerning technical banking matters and general business conditions. It is composed of one prominent banker from each of the twelve federal reserve districts, plus a secretary.

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR ICKES, as head of the federal public works administration, announced an ambitious family housing project for Chicago which, at a cost of $12,500,000, will abolish a "slum area" of 37 city blocks on the southwest side and replace demolished buildings with small apartment houses for 3,000 families. Condemnation proceedings were started in the Federal court in Chicago, and Mr. Ickes said if the property owners are reasonable in their demands the project will go through speedily. The area to be rehabilitated is inhabited now almost entirely by persons of Italian descent and, far from being a typical "slum," contains numerous neat, well-kept homes and several large apartment houses. The plan of the PWA for its rebuilding is very similar to housing projects in Moscow and Vienna, with the government supplying social and nursery facilities as well as dwellings. The work will be done through the federal housing corporation, which concern the government owns.

MISS GRACE ABBOTT, for years one of the government's most faithful and useful servants, has resigned her position as director of the children's bureau, to the grief of her associates in Washington and the regret of every one who knows about her fine work there. Miss Abbott now becomes professor of public welfare administration in the University of Chicago and editor of the Social Service Review.

AMERICA'S Cup remains in the United States and T. O. M. Sopwith, latest British challenger, goes home defeated and disgruntled. Harold S. Vanderbilt skippered the defending yacht Rainbow to four consecutive victories over Sopwith's Endeavour after the latter had won two races and seemed likely to carry the old trophy back to England. In the third race Sopwith flew his protest flag, claiming Rainbow had technically fouled Endeavour, but the racing committee refused to hear the protest because of a minor infraction of the rules. Sopwith was not the only person displeased by this action of the committee. In fact, general opinion was with him, and the races have left an unpleasant taste in the American mouth. However, it is probable the victory went to the better yacht, or the better crew, or both.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S request that the great textile strike be called off and that the workers be taken back without discrimination, after he had received and approved the report of the special mediation board headed by Gov. John G. Winant of New Hampshire brought to an end the bitter struggle that had cost 14 lives and millions of dollars. The union leaders ordered the strikers to return to the mills, and all the way from Maine to Alabama the looms hummed again.

Gov. Winant

The next step was the appointment by the President of a board to adjust disputes between the workers and the employers in the industry. He named the three veteran arbiters who served in like capacity as members of the steel labor relations board—Chief Justice Walter P. Stacy of North Carolina, Admiral Henry A. Wiley and James Mullenbach of Chicago.

The executive order stipulated that the board is "authorized and directed" to investigate wages, hours and other conditions in the industry to determine whether code provisions are being violated. If necessary, the board may refer its findings to proper governmental agencies for appropriate action.

The national labor relations board is made the court of appeal from any decision of the textile board. The board's findings are not subject to review by the executive branch of the government.

To start with, the board had the job of investigating numerous charges that some mill owners were discriminating against strikers. This alleged action so angered the union members that many demands for a renewal of the strike were sent in to the office of Francis J. Gorman, who directed the great walkout.

Meanwhile the leaders of the United Textile Workers went ahead with their plans to unionize the entire industry.

QUEEN MARY OF ENGLAND, accompanied by King George and the prince of Wales, went to Clydebank, Scotland, and there launched the largest steamship in the world, the 73,000-ton Cunard-White Star liner that was started four years ago. Breaking a bottle of Australian champagne on its bow, the queen christened the huge vessel "Queen Mary."

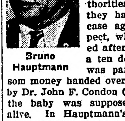
EIGHT per cent boost in wages, amounting to more than $10,000,000 a year, has been granted their employees by the four big packing concerns of Chicago, Swift, Armour, Wilson and Cudahy, and their example is followed by packing companies in other cities.

The wage increases were granted as a result of negotiations between the companies and their plant labor conference boards. Whether the increases were the full demands of the workers or were compromises was not stated. The plant boards are established at all points at which the companies operate and they are composed of employee representatives, half of whom are chosen by the workers themselves and half by the managements.

MORE than two thousand persons perished in a typhoon that swept over the richest industrial section of Japan in which are situated Osaka, Kobe, and Kyoto. Thousands of others were injured, and the property damage was enormous, probably running above $100,000,000. The army's munitions program suffered a great setback, for scores of factories that were turning out guns and munitions were destroyed. Losses among the fishermen and farmers also were most serious.

MAXIM LITVINOV told the League of Nations assembly that Russia still hopes for the establishment of a permanent peace conference in which the United States is a participant, for the consolidation of peace movements. He asked the league council to obtain a report on whether the world disarmament conference could be resumed with a possibility of success.

EVIDENCE was presented to a grand jury in New York against Bruno Richard Hauptmann, the former German machine gunner and journeyman carpenter accused of extortion in connection with the Lindbergh baby kidnaping. Colonel and Mrs. Lindbergh flew from Los Angeles to give their testimony. The authorities considered they had an ironclad case against the suspect, who was arrested after he had passed a ten dollar note that was part of the ransom money handed over a garden wall by Dr. John F. Condon ("Jafsie") when the baby was supposed to be still alive. In Hauptmann's garage was found $13,750 of the ransom fund, his handwriting was found to be identical with that of the ransom notes, and there were many other facts plainly indicating his guilt. He explained his possession of the money by saying it was paid him by one Isidor Fische who later died in Germany, but this defense was said by the police to have been exploded.



Bruno Hauptmann

The grand jury in New York indicted Hauptmann on charges of extortion, and when he was arraigned he pleaded not guilty. The detectives worked like beavers and found, among other incriminating evidence, $840 more hidden in the Hauptmann garage. This the prisoner admitted was part of the ransom money. The police said they expected the early arrest of two alleged accomplices of Hauptmann, one of whom was in Germany and the other on a liner bound for Europe.

New Jersey authorities expect to indict and try Hauptmann as the actual kidnaper and murderer of the Lindbergh child.

SO FAR President Roosevelt has not revealed his plans for relief for the coming winter, but the executive committee of the United States conference of mayors on unemployment relief has made its recommendations to him. These are, in effect, that a permanent federal relief fund should be established preparatory to the creation of a nationwide system of unemployment insurance. The report says:

"This permanent unemployment work relief fund and program should include the following features:

"1—It should include all workers of all types.

"2—The governments, federal, state, and municipal, should draw upon those benefited from the fund for work on public work relief projects.

"3—Such benefited persons should be paid prevailing wage rates up to the amount of the determined benefits.

"4—The United States should be divided into regions for the purpose of fixing weekly benefits in accordance with the regional costs and standards of living.

"5—General administration and supervision of the plan and fund should be the responsibility of the federal government."

WHEN President Roosevelt's plan for a $75,000,000 "tree belt" from Canada to Texas, previously discussed in this column, was submitted to Controller General McCarl, that gentleman turned it down as an improper use of funds from the $525,000,000 emergency drouth appropriation. The President, however, has not abandoned the project, though he told the correspondents he was in full accord with the controller general's ruling that emergency drouth funds might be used for putting men to work planting trees, but could not be used for land purchases. He said the original plan of the administration was to begin the shelter belt project with $15,000,000 of drouth money, and that some of this was to be used to purchase land.

The President said the shelter belt project, designed to protect the Middle West region from future drouths, would be carried out, but that the initial funds would have to be taken from sources not yet determined.

Coffee Instead of Milk in Cake Baking

Did you know that you can use coffee instead of milk in making cakes? The coffee will give the cake an unusual and pleasing flavor. But remember to use a little less coffee than you would milk, and remember also that your cake will not be so rich and that it will dry out faster than if milk were used. The coffee is worth trying, however.

United States in Lead in Soap Consumption

Figures just published show that the world production of soap is on the increase. Of the 4,700,000 tons produced in 1932, Europe manufactured 2,500,000 tons, the United States 1,800,000 tons, Africa and Asia 300,000 tons conjointly, and Australia and New Zealand 70,000 tons.

The cleanest nation, statistically, is America, which leads the world with a consumption of 11.5 kilos of soap per head a year. Then follow the Netherlands, 11.1; Denmark, 10; Great Britain, 9; Australia, 8.7; France, 8; and at the other end of the scale Poland, Jugoslavia, Rumania, and Bulgaria with an average of only 2 kilos or less. A kilo is approximately two pounds three and a quarter ounces. China, which hardly washes at all, cannot be taken into consideration, but some of the smaller soap-using nations use efficient substitutes, and in Germany soap making is still largely a domestic occupation, one-man factories being widespread, thus making it difficult to obtain an exact estimate of the national output.

ADDITIONAL ROUTES.

Whenever, either by reason of the creation of a new county, or by reason of the change of the county seat of any existing county, any city or village not a county seat at the time of the adoption of this amendment is lawfully constituted the county seat of any county, the legislature is authorized to add to the trunk highway system such additional routes connecting such newly constituted county seats with other county seats and other points in the state.

When after at least seventy-five (75) per cent of the total number of the miles of the routes embraced in the trunk highway system hereinbefore specified shall have been constructed and permanently improved, the legislature shall have authority to add new routes to such trunk highway system; provided, however, that no such new routes shall be added until and unless the funds available for the construction, improvement and maintenance of such additional routes shall be sufficient therefor in addition to the construction, improvement and maintenance of the several routes hereinbefore specifically described."

If amended as proposed by the legislature this section will read exactly the same as it now reads except that the last paragraph now appearing in this section will be omitted therefrom, and in the place of and instead of the paragraph so omitted will appear a paragraph which reads as follows:

"The legislature shall have authority to add new routes to such trunk highway system. All new routes added to the trunk highway system by act of the legislature during the session of 1933, are hereby ratified and confirmed. Provided, however, that no such new routes shall be added after the adoption of this amendment, until and unless at least seventy-five (75) per cent of the total number of the miles of the routes embraced in the trunk highway system heretofore created and established either by Article 16 of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota or by the legislature under and pursuant to said Article 16 shall have been constructed and permanently improved."

The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The purpose and effect of this amendment is to ratify and confirm the establishment of all new routes added to the trunk highway system by the 1933 legislature, and to give the legislature unrestricted authority to add new routes to the trunk highway system after seventy-five (75) per cent of the total number of the miles of the routes established by Article 16 of the State Constitution and established by the legislature acting pursuant thereto prior to the time this amendment was proposed, have been constructed and permanently improved.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 2.

By the adoption of Chapter 441 of the Laws of 1933, the legislature has proposed an amendment to Section 10 of Article 9 of the State Constitution.

This section now reads as follows:

"The credit of the state shall never be given or loaned in aid of any individual, association or corporation, except as hereinafter provided. Nor shall there be any further issue of bonds denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad Bonds,' under what purports to be an amendment to section ten (10) of article nine (9) of the Constitution, adopted April 15, 1858, which is hereby expunged from the Constitution, saving, excepting and reserving to the state, nevertheless, all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment. Provided, however, that for the purpose of developing the agricultural resources of the state, the state may establish and maintain a system of rural credits and thereby loan money and extend credit to the people of the state upon real estate security in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by law, and to issue and negotiate bonds to provide money to be so loaned. The limit of indebtedness contained in section 5 of this article shall not apply to the provisions of this section, and the purposes for which the credit of the state or the aforesaid municipal subdivisions thereof may be given or loaned as herein provided are declared to be public purposes."

If amended as proposed by the legislature this section will read as follows:

"The credit of the state shall never be given or loaned in aid of any individual, association or corporation, except as hereinafter provided. Nor shall there be any further issue of bonds denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad Bonds,' under what purports to be an amendment to Article 9, Section 10 of the Constitution, adopted April 15th, 1858, which is hereby expunged from the Constitution, saving, excepting and reserving to the state, nevertheless, all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment. Provided, however, that for the purpose of developing the agricultural resources of the state, the state may establish and maintain a system of rural credits and thereby loan money and extend credit to the people of the state upon real estate security in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by law, and to issue and negotiate bonds to provide money to be so loaned. The limit of indebtedness contained in Section 5 of this article shall not apply to the provisions of this section, and the purposes for which the credit of the state or the aforesaid municipal subdivisions thereof may be given or loaned as herein provided are declared to be public purposes.

The legislature may authorize the taxing of any lands, title to which is acquired by the state through the operation of such system of rural credits, during the period such lands are held by the state, and for the assessment thereof for benefits arising from improvement, and may provide for the payment of such taxes and assessments out of the operation of such system of rural credits. In lieu of such taxation the legislature may appropriate to the school districts, towns, counties, cities, villages and boroughs in which such lands are located sums of money not exceeding the amounts which would have been realized by such governmental subdivisions from the assessments against or taxation of such lands if privately owned."

It will be noted that the present Section 10 of Article 9 remains unchanged as the first paragraph of the proposed amendment but that a second paragraph is added to said section.

The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to give the legislature the power to do one of two things which it now lacks the constitutional power to do, namely: first, to authorize the taxing of any land, and the assessment of benefits for improvements against any land, which the state has acquired and owns or may acquire and own through the operation of the system of rural credits and to provide for the payment of such taxes and assessments out of the funds of the Rural Credit Department; or, second, to appropriate to the counties, towns, school districts, cities, villages and boroughs in which are located lands acquired and owned by the state under the rural credit acts sums of money not exceeding the amounts which would be realized by said governmental subdivisions from the taxation of such lands and from the assessment of benefits against such lands if owned by private persons.

Under the Rural Credit Act the state has become the owner of thousands of farms located in various counties of the state. As our State Constitution now stands, such land, being owned by the state, cannot be taxed. It naturally follows that other land within the same taxing district must pay higher taxes.

Likewise, the legislature does not now have the power to appropriate to the counties, towns, school districts, cities, villages and boroughs any funds of the Rural Credit Department to reimburse them for losses suffered by them because large areas of land acquired by the state under the rural credit law thereby have been removed from the tax rolls.

The effect of the passing of this amendment, if the power thereby given is acted upon by the legislature, will be to make good to these local subdivisions, in whole or in part, the loss they now suffer because they cannot tax rural credit land.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 3.

By the adoption of Chapter 412 of the Laws of 1933, the legislature has proposed an amendment to Section 1 of Article 9 of the State Constitution.

This section now reads as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, and public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of a family, as the legislature may determine: Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

If amended as proposed by the legislature, this section will read as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of a family, and household goods and farm machinery, as the legislature may determine:

Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The purpose and effect of this amendment is to grant to the legislature, in addition to the power now granted by said section to exempt personal property, the authority to exempt from taxation, such household goods of each household, and such farm machinery of each farm, as it may see fit. By the present Section 1 of Article 9 the legislature is granted the authority to exempt from taxation unspecified personal property not exceeding in value $200 for each household, individual, or head of a family.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 4.

By the adoption of Chapter 443 of the Laws of 1933 the legislature has proposed an amendment to Article 8 of the State Constitution. This amendment will not add to or alter any existing section of the Constitution, but will add a new section to be known as Section 8 of Article 8. The proposed amendment reads as follows:

"Any of the public lands of the state, including lands held in trust for any purpose, may, with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor, be exchanged for lands of the United States and other privately owned lands as the legislature may provide, and the lands so acquired shall be subject to the trust, if any, to which the lands exchanged therefor were subject, and the state shall reserve all mineral and water and water power rights in lands so transferred by the state."

The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The purpose and effect of this amendment is to authorize the legislature to provide for exchanging any of the public lands of the state for lands of the United States and land privately owned, such exchanges to be made with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor. Such exchanges of land cannot now be made because the State Constitution does not permit the legislature to authorize the sale of school lands, state swamp lands and state internal improvement lands except by public sale. One immediate purpose in granting such authority is to make it possible for the state to acquire compact areas of land for forest and other conservation purposes by exchanging land outside of such conservation areas for lands of the United States and privately owned lands within such areas.

The amendment requires that all mineral rights, water rights and water power rights in lands so transferred by the state shall be reserved. The land so acquired will become subject to the same trust, if any, as the land disposed of. For example, if school land is given in exchange, the land received will become school land.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 5.

By the adoption of Chapter 444 of the Laws of 1933, the legislature proposed an amendment to Section 1 of Article 9 of the State Constitution. At present Section 1 of Article 9 reads as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but pub-

"If you were a diplomat abroad would you learn the language of the country to which you were assigned?"

"No," answered Senator Sorghum. "There is a danger in trying to be a linguist. It's liable to tempt a man to spend the best years of his life learning his Abc's over and over again."—Washington Star.

"I used to tell my son that if he was a good boy I'd take him to the circus."

"Is he too old for that?"

"Rather. Now he intimates that if I succeed in keeping in his good graces he may get me a ticket to see him play football."

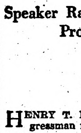
Speaker Rainey's Death Starts Race for His Position—Prominent Men Organize Liberty League to Combat Radicalism.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

HENRY T. RAINEY, veteran congressman from Illinois and speaker of the house, died unexpectedly in a St. Louis hospital while he was believed to be recovering from an attack of bronchial pneumonia. The immediate cause of his death was angina pectoris. Mr. Rainey, who was within a day of being seventy-four years old, was first elected to congress in 1902, and he served continuously with the exception of one term, being defeated in the Harding landslide of 1920. He was elected to the speakership when John Nance Garner became Vice President. His control over the house during the sessions of last year and this year, while the President's program was being put through, was gentle but so firm that the legislators were kept well in line.



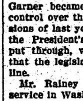
Henry T. Rainey

Mr. Rainey devoted much of his service in Washington to efforts to improve the condition of the farmers, for he held that farm prosperity was essential in any program for national well being. He also was a student of tariff and fiscal subjects. As a Democrat he was always a "regular." He was the author of the tariff commission law and of much other important legislation.

Mrs. Rainey acted as her husband's secretary for years and is so well acquainted with congressional work that the Democrats may select her as the candidate to complete his term as representative from the Twentieth Illinois district.

Mr. Rainey was buried in his home town, Carrollton, after services which were attended by President Roosevelt and many other notable persons.

SPEAKER RAINEY'S death will result in a spirited contest among a number of men who are ambitious to succeed him. First in the line of succession, so to speak, is Representative Joseph W. Byrns of Tennessee, who has been serving as majority floor leader and who is head of the Democratic national congressional committee. President Roosevelt is going to take no part in the race, but the more liberal of the New Dealers are known to favor Sam Rayburn of Texas. Well informed observers believe Byrns will be elected speaker and Rayburn floor leader. Other aspirants for the speakership are John E. Rankin of Mississippi, who has announced his candidacy; William B. Bankhead of Alabama, and John J. O'Connor of New York.



Joseph W. Byrns

Mr. Byrns has been a member of the house continuously since his election to the Sixty-first congress. His work as floor leader, in conjunction with Rainey's rule as speaker, was not especially pleasing to the New Dealers for some months during the last session, but before adjournment most of the misunderstandings were cleared up. In any case, the administration seldom interferes in the selection of the leaders of congress, not wishing to incur the enmity of powerful members of the party.

RETURNING from his swift trip to attend the funeral of Mr. Rainey, the President went directly back to Washington instead of going to his Hyde Park home. This change in plan was due, it was said, to the development of a bitter dispute between Gen. Hugh S. Johnson on one side and Donald Richberg, Mr. Roosevelt's chief industrial adviser, and Secretary of Labor Perkins on the other, over the new structure to be given the NRA.

The issue, it was disclosed, is whether there shall be a board of control in authoritative management of the NRA or a board which shall be more advisory in power, leaving the real control still in the hands of the administrator and his deputies. It was expected Mr. Roosevelt would take command of the situation and determine definitely what shall be done with the recovery administration.

ORGANIZED labor scored a victory over Recovery Administrator Johnson when the national labor relations board ordered John Donovan, former president of the NRA union dismissed by Johnson for "inefficiency," reinstated to his position with the labor advisory board.

"The agencies which are administering the law should in their own dealings uphold its purposes," the board said in its decision, giving a veiled reproof to Johnson for what it implied was a violation of section 7a of the NRA.

With rather bad grace the NRA accepted the rebuke and permitted Donovan to return to his job. Johnson himself had nothing to say about it, but Dr. Gustav Peck, Donovan's immediate superior, issued a statement in which he sniffed at the board's decision and warned Donovan that he would have to "toe the mark."

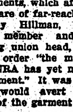
Soon after this the NRA announced that it does not regard itself as obliged to withdraw the Blue Eagle in cases where the national labor relations board has found companies guilty of violation of section 7A of the national industrial recovery act and of subsequent failure to obey the instructions of the board.

The labor board has recommended withdrawal of the Blue Eagle to the NRA compliance board in all cases where companies have disobeyed its instructions to reinstate discharged employees. The decision by the NRA will remove teeth from decisions by the board, since it may now hear cases, make decisions, and find that no penalties are inflicted for disobeying its orders.

COTTON garment code amendments reducing the working hours and giving workers a wage increase have been signed by the President. The amendments, which affect plants in 42 states, are of far-reaching importance.

Sidney Hillman, labor advisory board member and Amalgamated Clothing union head, termed signing of the order "the most far-reaching move NRA has yet made to increase employment." It was hoped that this order would avert the threatened strike of the garment workers.

TWO prominent Democrats, two Republicans almost equally prominent, and one leading industrialist, all of them of conservative tendencies, have united to organize the American Liberty league dedicated to a war on radicalism in the United States. The five founders of the league are: Alfred E. Smith, Democratic Presidential candidate in 1928; John W. Davis Democratic Presidential candidate in 1924; Nathan L. Miller, Republican ex-governor of New York; James W. Wadsworth, Republican congressman from New York, former senator and Presidential possibility for 1936; Irenee Du Pont, manufacturer, who supported Smith in 1928 and Roosevelt in 1932. They believe the league membership will grow into the millions and that it will become an important element in the national life.



Jouett Shouse

For president of the organization the founders selected Jouett Shouse, former chairman of the Democratic national committee and president of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment until repeal was accomplished. In a statement Mr. Shouse set forth the purposes of the league as follows:

"It is a nonpartisan organization, formed, as stated in its charter, 'to defend and uphold the Constitution of the United States and to gather and disseminate information that (1) will teach the necessity of respect for the rights of persons and property as fundamental to every successful form of government, and (2) will teach the duty of government to encourage and protect individual and group initiative and enterprise, to foster the right to work, earn, save, and acquire property, and to preserve the ownership and lawful use of property when acquired.'"

To interviewers Mr. Shouse declared the league was not anti-Roosevelt, but it seemed clear that it will be opposed to most of the major purposes of the New Deal and the radical professors of the brain trust. He said he had visited the President and informed him fully of the purposes of the league, but he would not tell what Mr. Roosevelt's reaction had been.

IN THE nature of a reply to the formation of the American Liberty league was a speech delivered in Washington by Secretary of Commerce Daniel C. Roper. He denied that the "profit motive in American life has been or is to be abolished" by the New Deal, asserting that it seeks only to abolish "certain profit abuses," such as profits on watered stocks and disproportionate salaries.

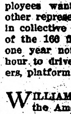
"Private enterprise," said Mr. Roper, "is getting back upon its own feet, and more and more is exerting its initiative and is able to relieve the federal government of responsibilities, which under normal conditions belong to business.

"Pardon my repeating again that the Roosevelt administration is squarely behind this principle. It believes in just profits for management and capital and an equitable return to labor for its rightful rewards in the economic processes.

"No thinking business man desires to have the old order restored. He does desire and is entitled to have the new order characterized by a better control against economic cataclysms and by the freedom to exercise his initiative in planning for the future of his business in the light of an equitable profit system."

THE strike of truck drivers in Minneapolis was ended when the men and their employers accepted a compromise agreement, and martial law in the city was discontinued, business thereafter speeding back to normal conditions. The peace plan, devised by federal representatives, provided that all employees on strike be returned to their jobs without discrimination and on basis of seniority. It included an agreement to hold an election within ten days in each of the 166 firms involved to determine whether their employees want the drivers' union or other representatives to act for them in collective bargaining, and a pledge of the 166 firms to pay for at least one year not less than 50 cents an hour to drivers and 40 cents to helpers, platform men and inside workers.

WILLIAM GREEN, president of the American Federation of Labor, says he hopes the general strike of textile industry workers will be averted; but he announces at the same time that the federation indorses the strike and will cooperate fully with the officers and members of the United Textile Workers' organization. He appointed federation committees to assist the textile workers and announced that he would draft trained organizers and strike specialists from other unions to assist the textile union.



William Green

George A. Sloan, president of the Cotton Textile institute and chairman of the cotton textile code authority, said the threatened strike is not justified by the facts established by impartial government economists.

Challenging the wage increase demand of the United Textile Workers of America, Mr. Sloan declared that "as a result of three basic wage provisions in the code the hourly wages paid in March, 1934, show an increase of 7 per cent as compared with March, 1933, when there was no code.

"All of this has meant a substantial increase in manufacturing costs," Mr. Sloan said, "and the research and planning division of the NRA found, after a comprehensive investigation last June, that 'under existing conditions there is no factual or statistical basis for any general increase in cotton textile code wage rates.'"

Mr. Sloan estimated the present number of workers at work in some 1,200 mills in the cotton industry at 460,000.

LIEUT.-COL. MARIO HERNANDEZ organized a plot to overthrow the government of President Mendieta of Cuba and establish a military dictatorship, but the authorities got wind of it and frustrated the conspiracy, in which a considerable part of the army was involved. Col. Fulgencio Batista, head of the army, said that Major Benitez and some soldiers were sent to arrest Hernandez and that eight men of the detachment were killed. Hernandez tried to shoot Benitez but was himself shot in the head and neck. The official report said Hernandez was being rushed toward Havana in an automobile and that the car upset, the prisoner being killed, though the others in the car were uninjured.

Maj. Angel Echevarria, commandant of Fourth infantry at Camp Columbia, and Capt. Augustin Erice, chief of the signal corps, conspirators with Hernandez, were captured later and a summary court martial sentenced them to death.

Four thousand troops in Pinar del Rio are confined to barracks, under arrest, and a thorough reorganization of the entire high command of the Cuban army is in full swing. About 200 civilians have also been arrested as parties to the conspiracy, charged with carrying messages to military plotters.

EIGHTY-EIGHT Soviet citizens are now under arrest in Manchukuo, charged with plotting against Manchukuo and Japan and sabotaging Japanese military trains. The Russian government, through Acting Consul General Rayvid at Harbin, has presented to the foreign office of Manchukuo a demand for an explanation of the arrests and insists on prompt measures for the release of the prisoners.

"The arrests were made without documents, accompanied by searches of the apartments and offices of Soviet employees of the Chinese Eastern railway which have not been explained," Rayvid said.

The Japanese allege that some of the prisoners confessed to an attack on the Japanese military intelligence office at Suifenho (Pogranichnaya), to sending Manchurian and Corean communists into the territory, to wrecking trains carrying Japanese troops and munitions toward the frontier, and to creating general disturbances along the eastern line.

Probably before long will come the news that the Japanese have seized the Chinese Eastern railway, and that may very well result in war between Japan and Russia.

BY A vote of about 10 to 1 the people of Germany decided that Chancellor Adolf Hitler's action in assuming the powers of president was all right. The result of the plebiscite was: "Yes," 38,362,769; "No," 4,294,654; "Invalid," 872,296. Though the "yes" votes were several million less than in the November plebiscite on the withdrawal from the League of Nations, the Nazis are satisfied and Hitler appears to be safely fixed as the country's ruler for the rest of his life. His power, as chancellor-leader, is greater than that of any other dictator,

Delicacies for the Winter Menu

Preserving Season at Hand; Abundant Supply of Cheap Fruit.

Midsummer is a time looked forward to by the thrifty housewife, for with it comes the pleasant task of canning and preserving for the family's winter need of jams, jellies and preserves.

Market reports indicate a plentiful supply of pears, peaches, grapes and other delicious fruits.

Here are two tested and economical recipes:

Concord Grape Jelly.

4 cups (2 lbs.) juice
½ bottle of fruit pectin
7½ cups (3¼ lbs.) sugar

To prepare juice, stem about three pounds fully ripe grapes and crush thoroughly. Add one-half cup water, bring to a boil, cover, and simmer ten minutes. Place fruit in jelly cloth or bag and squeeze out juice. (If malagas or other tight-skinned grapes are used, the juice of one lemon should be added to prepared juice).

Measure sugar and juice into large saucepan and mix. Bring to a boil over hottest fire and at once add bottled fruit pectin, stirring constantly. Then bring to a full rolling boil and boil hard one-half minute. Remove from fire, skim, pour quickly. Paraffin hot jelly at once. Makes about 11 glasses (six fluid ounces each).

Ginger Pear Jam.

(Using crystallized ginger)
4 cups (2 lbs.) prepared fruit
½ to 1 cup diced crystallized ginger
1 bottle fruit pectin
7½ cups (3¼ lbs.) sugar

To prepare fruit, peel, core and crush completely or grind about three pounds fully ripe pears. Dice about one-half pound crystallized ginger.

Measure sugar and prepared fruit, tightly packed, into large kettle. Add ginger, mix well, and bring to a full rolling boil over hottest fire. Stir constantly before and while boiling. Boil hard one minute. Remove from fire and stir in bottled fruit pectin. Then stir and skim by turns for just five minutes to cool slightly, to prevent floating fruit. Pour quickly. Paraffin hot jam at once. Makes about 11 glasses (six fluid ounces each). This product may take a week to reach a usable set.

Earthquake Prophet

Earthquakes give no warning of their approach, and the seismograph gives only an accurate record of the intensity and duration of the shock. But a Japanese professor, the late T. Omari, carried out a great deal of research work on a method that has now been perfected. He took hundreds of shock measurements at regular intervals in areas where the horizontal and vertical stresses due to earthquakes had accumulated for years. By this method he was able to predict the exact time and location of the next shock. Shortly before his death he warned a fishing community that their village would be wiped out within a few days. The place was evacuated and the shock arrived and demolished the place to the minute. Another method is to watch the movements of the Japanese catfish. When these are stirred into activity and rise to the surface, a serious earthquake is imminent.—Tit-Bits Magazine.

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a faculty position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer meets Prof. Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy. At the school the group is struck by an air of mystery pervading the place. Gordon Haskell, proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne completes the Academy faculty. In a schoolroom Janet finds a group which the teachers had supposed were scholars, are wax figures. Haskell explains unusual circumstances connected with the conduct of the Academy. Among the pupils is Berenice Bracebridge, daughter of the late owner of the school. The story of the tragedy of Lostland Academy is that of two sisters and two brothers of Berenice, who lost their lives in the water, at the same moment, some years ago. The wax figures were modeled in the likenesses of the four children, and Doctor Bracebridge's will provided that they must be preserved. Payne learns from Berenice that the uncouth giant whom Janet had seen with Haskell is named Balder, and is a valuable servant.

—11—

"Thank you, mother!"

Berenice looked around with a quick smile. "Don't mind Mother Martha. She's old and tired, and she says just what she thinks, like children. She was nurse to all my brothers and sisters."

"All of them," came the quavering voice. "All those little chicks."

"You don't mind if she comes with us? She's like Balder. She doesn't feel any fear of them."

She picked up a small, rose-shaded night lamp, and, holding it a little higher than her head, went on before Payne. The light cast rosy shadows on her white silk dress and down the delicate whiteness of her arm. She wore a blue sash knotted just above her hips. When they came to the foot of the basement stairs she motioned Payne to go on ahead of her. "It's the seventh door to the left."

He began to feel his skin pricking a little, and that unique coldness come into his breast which is a sure accompaniment of fear, yet he endeavored to laugh at his own sensation. What utter folly! He, a grown man, nervous over four wax figures representing four handsome children peacefully at study.

At the door he waited for her, turning his head so as not to look into the circular glass inset. A horrid feeling possessed him that he might see a face on the other side of the glass peering out into the passage! Berenice turned the handle and entered. Her manner seemed to change instantly, and she breathed a sigh of relief.

"Always just before opening the door I think 'perhaps they are gone,' though I know it is a foolish thought—then I see them here quite still and lovely, and I am very content; but the coming here! That's dreadful."

"That hair ribbon on Isabel's head has one end too long," Mother Martha said, and crept across the stone flagging. "Old Mother Martha can tie the ribbon better than that—can't she?" She crooned in an old, weary, but tender voice.

Berenice watched her retie the ribbon, and turned appealing eyes to Payne as if to ask his understanding of the rather pitiful action. In that moment he felt a refreshment of spirit, a receding of barriers, an opening of the paths of the sky, which transmuted the scene into a tableau of enchantment. He had never dreamed that love would come to him suddenly and swiftly, upsetting all his calculations, disturbing the ordered peace of his scholarship.

"She acts as if the old, happy tending of your brothers and sisters was still very real to her."

"Sometimes I think she fancies they are really alive. She is very old—and the old love the past."

"And you are very young. The past should not be allowed to grip you too heavily."

"You do not like these figures!"

"They are beautiful—quite marvelously made. But considering the circumstances—" he hesitated.

"Yes, I know—they seem morbid things. But perhaps my poor father was not wholly well when he drew up his will."

"People are afraid of them—"

"Oh, yes, they are afraid; the school grew emptier and emptier, then stopped, then, after some years, I asked my guardian to have teachers—just for me and the farmers' boys and girls. You see, I wanted the lightning dispersed a little. Oh, Mother Martha, dear—don't you know that sash is quite perfect?"

"Poor children! They ought to go to bed—who's keepin' 'em up?"

"No one, dear. There, sit on the bench; I want to show them more closely."

She held the rose light before each face in turn, oddly lighting her own at the same time, so she was actually a part of that ring of radiance. The elongated shadows leaped up the gray ceiling as if trying to escape. Mother Martha, suddenly sleepy, as happens to the very old, nodded and drew her crimson shawl about her. Berenice put down the lamp. "Shall we sit here a few moments?"

"And may I ask you a question?"

"A dozen."

"Do you like dancing, walking, riding? Would you like us for companions as well as teachers, Miss Mercer—Arthur Fleming and I?"

"Oh, so much! I've been lonely."

"And I wish you'd promise me something—not to come too often to this gloomy basement room."

"Don't make me promise that! There are days when I have this strange fear of the figures—oh, it's like a black oppression, and then I have to come down and reassure myself they are really here, not stealing about the house! How foolish this must sound to you!"

"No! You see, you grew up with the story!"

Payne picked up the lamp. Berenice bent her fair face close to Mother Martha's brown and wrinkled one. "Come, dear; all the little chickens are asleep."

The ancient woman rose obediently. "You must go to sleep, too."

Berenice said: "She likes to tuck me in. She forgets I'm nineteen."

Haskell stood at the end of the passage with a lamp in his hand.

"You were a very long time."

"My fault," said Wilton. "But they are amazingly well done."

"Well done! Too well done! I think I'll put a lock on that door; lock Berenice out of it. She goes there too much."

"Are there photographs of the children in that album upstairs in the drawing room?"

"There's nothing else," Haskell answered impatiently.

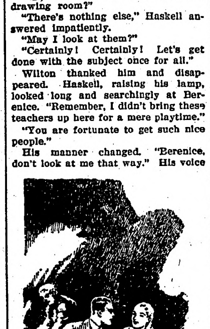
"May I look at them?"

"Certainly! Certainly! Let's get done with the subject once for all."

Wilton thanked him and disappeared. Haskell, raising his lamp, looked long and searchingly at Berenice. "Remember, I didn't bring these teachers up here for a mere playtime."

"You are fortunate to get such nice people."

His manner changed. "Berenice, don't look at me that way." His voice



"Poor Children! They Ought to Go to Bed."

sank almost to a whisper. "You know I love you. You can't expect me to be always the formal guardian. I would marry you tomorrow."

"I do not want to be married yet, Gordon. I've seen nothing! I know so little."

"Nothing you could learn could teach you to be lovelier," he said in a voice which had a note in it like reverence mingled with something more of the earth—and cruel in its way.

She started down the passage. Haskell had not followed her, but he held his lamp high until she returned; nor did he ask her where she was going. She went straight to the drawing room, where Payne was bending over the album.

"These photographs are very lovely."

"You won't mind what my guardian says, will you?"

"Certainly not! We must all endeavor to keep the peace."

"And you will not go away, whatever he does?"

"Go away!"

It was as if she had asked him if he would leave the sun road to Arcadia after a long wandering in the wrong paths. "No, I shall not go away."

"There's one thing I'd like to know very much."

"What is it?"

"Why I am always afraid in this house—oh, don't tell me that it is large, gloomy, old. Those things wouldn't make me afraid."

"We'll see—we'll watch—and see," Payne answered gently. "And promise me you won't go to the whirl too much."

"Something draws me there."

"Something will draw you away from there some day—away from these hills, out into life!"

Arthur and Janet were found in quiet contentment by a wood fire, each with a book. "Well, you've seen them," Arthur said as Wilton entered. "What does Hamlet think of them?"

"They recalled Ophelia—the drowning, I suppose! There is a queer aroma in that room, that, old and inky as it is, has naught to do with school books! Mother Martha retied a hair ribbon. Berenice held a lamp as if it had been a flower; and lit up her waxen kindred. I am going some day to call on Jerry Moore."

Tailored Ensemble Is Ultra Chic

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

SUITS are the foremost message for fall. The keynote to the suit mode is sounded in two words, variety and fabric. Which is to say that every type of suit or ensemble is represented that fancy may picture with emphasis placed on the handsomeness and novelty of the materials employed.

The new suit and tailored ensembles are that varied they include styles in every mood and tempo featuring coats and jackets all the way from seven-eighth to waistlength. As to silhouette they go from one extreme to another, from loose swagger styles to the neat and trim flared front basques which Schiaparelli creates so successfully, to which add all the variations between that key to individual preference. As to modish suit skirts they are straight and narrow, often slit at the hemline.

Speaking of materials, the tailored ensembles in the picture tell a story of high-style, quality-kind fabrics most eloquently. For street, campus or general daytime wear throughout autumn, these plaided and checked tailleurs are correct and smart to the Nth degree. So far as their rich vibrant color schemes are concerned they blend into the autumn landscape superbly.

Each of these models is fashioned of a soft-textured lightweight rabbit woolen fabric, which while it looks the part of luxury is in reality quite moderately priced. The fine fur woven into these suitings gives extra warmth for chilly days, which together with their attractive appearance make these weaves of pronounced appeal to fashion-wise seekers of superior materials.

At the right, in the picture, one of the new monotone shadow plaids in carioca red is used on the diagonal for the skirt of the one-piece frock and on vertical lines for the three-quarter coat. The bias sleeves correspond to the skirt treatment. A full scarf of brown velveteen lined with crepe in the red shade of the suit together with a belt in the same brown velvet lends smart contrast.

At the left, a coat cut with mannish lapels is made of a broken-checked rabbit woolen in old gold and brown, the same topping a gown of the identical material. The frock has a high turndown collar and a knotted tie of self-fabric. The rather wide belt is in brown leather with large decorative buckle.

One of the interesting highlights in the street and sports realm is what is referred to as the "purpose" suit. The idea is to assemble all of the same material, a jacket suit plus a full-length topcoat sometimes adding a fourth piece, perhaps one of the new jacket blouses or a shirtwaist effect with buttons down the front. Herein is constituted an entire wardrobe for daytime wear.

A vogue which is much in evidence this fall is the gay novelty-plaided or checked skirt which is worn with a dark solid colored top. The brown and yellow check which fashions the costume to the left would make up strikingly in one of the very new narrow, slim and slit-at-the-hemline skirts. Top this with a swanky brown velveteen or corduroy jacket-blouse (newer than a tuck-in) and this twosome will rank among the smartest of the season.

WIDE BELTS

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

Belts are growing wider and wider. The broad suede belt fastening with a composition arrow which graces this good-looking dress is typical of the new trend toward wide, wider, widest belted effects. This classically simple but very new campus frock is made of a lightweight two-tone rabbit woolen fabric. The high, wide-extending from side-to-side youthful and flattering neckline is the Alix idea.

Frogskin Shoes

Shoes of frogskin are the latest craze in Paris, and the feminine followers of fashion are taking to them.

MODISTES TAKE TO SCHOOLGIRL STYLES

"That simple little shirtwaist dress" may appear this season in anything from satin to sequins.

The knowing designers have discovered that it's highly amusing to present innocent, schoolgirlish styles in the most sophisticated and luxurious fabrics.

And women have discovered that their vampire voltage goes up at least 100 per cent when they wear seemingly ingenuous frocks in wicked materials.

It's the old principle of the excessively feminine girl who knows that her dimpled charms are heightened to the masculine eye by severely tailored lines. She is completely aware that her attempt at mannish clothes merely makes the obtuse male chuckle.

Satin With Feather Capes Will Be Worn This Autumn

Satin with feather capes will again be worn this autumn by the very smartest women, for they consider this fashion both chic and flattering, as well as allowing for lovely color contrasts.

Thus a frock of deep purplish-blue satin appears under a cape of soft green feathers and a pink satin frock allies itself with a cape of cornflower blue feathers. Another dress of pale satin is worn with a cape made of smoky gray feathers.

A black satin dress, cut on sheath lines is worn with a collar-like capelet of matching black satin edged with black heron feathers. All signs point to this fashion continuing for some time longer, until the really heavy formal evening wraps of velvet, lame and fine fur are seen.

Flexible Handbags

Bags for fall are soft, flexible things, many of them made without rigid frames. They are all shapes and sizes, from Schiaparelli's novel five-sided bag with inverted plaits to Molyneux's oblong, underarm model.

Essential Vitamins in Foods

Comprehensive A B C D List, Given Here, Should Be an Answer to All the Varied Problems of Every-Day Diet for the Family.

"Would you kindly publish brief lists of the foods that are rich in vitamins A, B, C, D respectively? A list of this sort seems to me a logical necessity if discussion is to prove helpful. If milk is deficient in B, what other food supplies it adequately? Is D only present in cod-liver oil? A brief list showing the principal foods supplying each of the vitamins would be generally appreciated, I know."

The above is a quotation from a letter from a reader and speaks for itself. As those of you who have been following this column know, I have published from time to time such information. The intervals between seem, I hope, longer to the readers than they do to me. I am so glad to have an excuse for repeating a "chart" of the vitamins and I am using the very comprehensive one prepared by Dr. Helen Mitchell of Battle Creek college. You will find it useful enough, I think, to cut out and paste it on a card for future reference.

You will notice that this summary answers the questions, except perhaps as to what irradiated foods are available. At present there are several cereals and breads treated in such a way that they supply vitamin D. There are also milks which contain vitamin D on account of the food fed to the cows which produce it, and an irradiated milk powder used mostly for infant feeding. There are also some cod liver oils which have been irradiated to give these already rich oils extra vitamin D content. As you look over this vitamin summary, you will see the point which I have so often emphasized again—a generous, varied diet is the answer to all the problems of every-day diet.

A—Rich food sources, anti-infective (antiopthalmic): Butter, cream, egg yolk, cod-liver oil, spinach, carrots, tomato.

Destruction by heat, drying, light, etc. Gradual destruction by exposure to heat; drying and oxidation.

Deficiency results in malnutrition, low resistance to infections of eye, ear, lungs, sinus and glands.

Experimental animals used: Rats, rabbits, chickens.

B—Antineuritic or antiberiberi. Yeast, whole grains, wheat embryo, nuts, legumes, spinach, tomato associated with G.

By excessive heating, 2 to 4 hours in superheated steam. Less stable than G.

Loss of appetite, fatigue, nervousness, constipation, beriberi (in man), polyneuritis (animals).

Experimental animals used: Rats, dogs, pigeons.

C — Antiscorbutic. Orange and other citrus fruits, tomato, pineapple, berries, cabbage, potato.

Rapid destruction by heat and oxidation except in acids; by drying and aging.

Malnutrition, scurvy, sore mouth, stiff joints, tooth defects.

Experimental animals used: Guinea pigs, monkeys.

D—Antirachitic. Cod liver oil, butter, egg yolk, foods irradiated with ultra-violet light.

More stable than A; destroyed by skeletal deformities, lung infection (?)

Experimental animals used: Rats, calves, dogs, chickens.

E—Reproductive. Wheat embryo, yellow corn, cotton seed, green leaves.

Stable to superheated steam, dilute acid and alkaline and drying.

Sterility in males, resorption of fetus in females (observations on rats only).

Experimental animals used: Rats.

G—Antipellagric or pellapreventive. Yeast, yeast extract, liver, eggs, milk, legumes associated with B.

More stable than B to superheated steam; withstands drying and aging.

Malnutrition, stunted growth, pel-excess irradiation with ultra-violet light.

Rickets, soft bones, poor teeth, lagra (in man), black tongue (in dogs).

Experimental animals used: Rats, dogs.

Crab Bisque.

1 lb. can crab meat
2 cups milk
1 cup chicken broth or hot water in which one chicken bouillon cube has been dissolved.
2 tablespoons butter
3 tablespoons flour
¾ teaspoon salt
Paprika
Whipped cream

Remove bones and chop crab meat fine. Cook crab meat and milk together in double boiler until milk is scalded. Melt butter, blend in flour to a smooth paste, slowly add chicken broth, stir until it boils. Add scalded milk and crab meat mixture to chicken broth and bring again to boiling point. Add seasoning. Serve on each portion of soup one heaping teaspoon whipped cream, seasoned with salt and paprika.

Spinach Loaf.

1 loaf white bread
5 tablespoons butter
1 tablespoon chopped onion
1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
1 cup chopped bread crumbs
¼ cup cream
3 cups cooked spinach

Remove the crust from a loaf of bread, cut out the center, leaving a wall one-half inch thick; brush over the case, both inside and out with melted butter and brown in a hot oven, 450 degrees F. Melt butter in a sauce pan, add onion and cook until it becomes yellow; add salt, pepper, bread crumbs, cream and cooked chopped spinach. Stir until thoroughly heated, pour into bread case. Decorate with sliced hard-cooked egg and serve with cheese sauce.

Why Liquid Laxatives are Back in Favor

The public is fast returning to the use of liquid laxatives. People have learned that the right dose of a properly prepared liquid laxative will bring a more natural movement without any discomfort at the time, or after.

The dose of a liquid laxative can be varied to suit the needs of the individual. The action can thus be regulated. A child is easily given the right dose. And mild liquid laxatives do not irritate the kidneys.

Doctors are generally agreed that senna is a natural laxative. It does not drain the system like the cathartics that leave you so thirsty. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is a liquid laxative which relies on senna for its laxative action. It gently helps the average person's constipated bowels until nature restores their regularity.

You can always get Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin at any drug store, ready for use.

[illegible] there may [illegible] from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of a family, as the legislature may determine: Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

If amended as proposed by the legislature, said section will read as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, and public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of a family as the legislature may determine. Academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning shall be construed to mean the property actually and exclusively used in the instruction and housing of the students thereof, and residences on the campus actually occupied by instructors of such institutions. Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of a railroad."

The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The purpose and effect of this amendment is to mention specifically and define definitely the property of academies, colleges, universities and seminaries of learning which shall be exempt from taxation. The present Section 1 of Article 9 provides that academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning shall be exempt from taxation, but does not specifically state what property of such institutions shall be tax exempt. If the proposed amendment is adopted the only property of said educational institutions which will be exempt from taxation under this section will be the property actually and exclusively used in the instruction and housing of the students thereof and residences on the campus actually occupied by instructors of such institutions.

—Candidate For—

District Judge

Appointed by Governor Olson, Feb. 28, 1934 to succeed Judge Julius J. Olson.

Nominated at the June Primary as a Candidate to Succeed Himself.

I feel deeply grateful, for the very large primary vote given me, being in excess of fifteen thousand, nine hundred votes, and wish to take this occasion to thank you, the electors of this district, for your splendid endorsement.

Because of the work of the office this fall, it will be impossible for me to make a personal campaign of this extensive district, and all that I can expect to do is to meet voters at such public gatherings as I shall have an opportunity to attend.

Since I have held the office of District Judge for but a few months, it is my hope that I may be privileged to serve in this capacity for a full term, striving to merit the confidence of your favorable votes November 6th.

Sincerely yours,
Michael A. Brattland.

Five Weeks on Wheels

High Lights of An Auto Tour to the West Coast

by Hans O. Hanson

9. Cheyenne thru Wyoming

Last week we left you in our travel at Cheyenne. We were having a great visit with Mr. Charles B. Stafford, executive manager of the Department of Commerce and Industry of the state of Wyoming. Mr. Stafford used to be in the insurance business in Crookston some years ago and had a lot of good to say for old Minnesota. He showed us maps and work charts of the state of Wyoming where active and proposed irrigated projects and farming communities were located.

Thru the information recieved from him we were able to see more of Wyoming than any of the other states we traveled thru. He explained to us how wonderful the Grand Teton National Park was. This park is in the northwest part of Wyoming and is only a few miles south of the Yellowstone Park.

We are sure that many a person from here who has read about the Grand Teton Mountain and Jackson Hole would like to go there some time. The west has a calling that is hard to pass up after you have once seen part of it and, as we sit in our little office setting up this story about our trip we are planning on our next cross-country trip when the time comes.

We missed Colorado due to the fact that they were doing so much road constuction in the mountains there this year. We were only a hundred miles from Denver when we were in Cheyenne. It makes a swell trip to go southwest thru Colorado and Arizona. Then one could see the Grand Canyon of the great Colorado, the Boulder Dam and swinging east; take in the Carlsbad Caves in New Mexico and the panhandle country.

Leaving Cheyenne we headed northeast thru some very good farming country. It was both irrigated and dry farming between Cheyenne and Torrington. At Torrington we spent some time visiting with some farmers that we met on the streets in the afternoon. One of them was a Mr. Peterson who used to live in southern part of Minnesota and said he was an old neighbor of Beebe in Saint Hilaire.

These farmers told us that when they first came to Wyoming some twenty years ago it considered only a fair crop to get 30 bushels of wheat to the acre and that many a year they got as high as 45 to 50 bushels per acre. Oats used to run 65 to 95 and barley was always a fair averege yield. Now the majority of the farmers around there were growing sugar beets. They claimed their soil there put a heavy sugar content into the beets and that they were getting a fair return out of their farms with that crop. It was quite dry there this year but they got a heavy rain the day we were there.

We went on northwest from Torrington to see more of the state and its historic places. We followed the North Platte river to Guernsey. There we stopped over night in a large tourist camp on the river bank. This park consisted of about 50 acres and was well shaded with groves of giant trees of many species and nice bushes. It was a real spot for a good rest.

From Guersey we went on a side trip into the rough mountains for about six miles to a small mining town called Sunrise. There we visited an iron mine. This mine was different than our mines on the Iron range in Minnesota inasmuch as the ore at the Sunrise mine was all in one solid chunk while the local ore comes more loose like black dirt. The mine was owned by the Rockefeller interests in the east. They told us that J. D. Rockefeller bought this mine shortly after it was discovered many years ago at a low price and that the output from it has helped considerable in making his shiny dimes to give away.

The mine property was worked by a colony of Italians. They worked full time and had little so say regarding the new deal or anybody else when we interviewed them on the subject.

From this little mining town we went back to the main road at Guersey. On our way in we passed a large goat ranch where some bachelors were keeping a hundred milk goats. It was at milking time and we saw the goats jump up on the small platforms that they stand on off of the ground while being milked. This goat milk was sold at 14c a quart. A milk goat only gives about a quart to each milking.

We moved on northwest and crossed the North Platte river at the old historic "Bridger" crossing near Orin. On the way there we saw many marked spots where today lie buried many a tough frontierman and where at one time had stood stage coach station and fighting grounds. We saw a few stretches now and then of the old historic stage coach trails on the mountain sides.

At Orin we swung eastward to Manville. There we cut off of the highway and went south for about twelve miles into some wild and rough country to look at the Spanish Diggings (aboriginal stone quarries of prehistoric age.) These diggings are the only ones of the kind in the world and rock such as found there has not yet been discovered any other place.

More next week.

Once our county was nearly bankrupt, but today we are in good financial situation; we pay cash as we go on every fund except the poor fund, and it will not be long before we pay cash as we go on that fund. Our 1935 tax year should show a considerable decrease in county tax. I am greatly interested in the welfare of our county and its people, and I would like to continue working for the county and its people for another term.

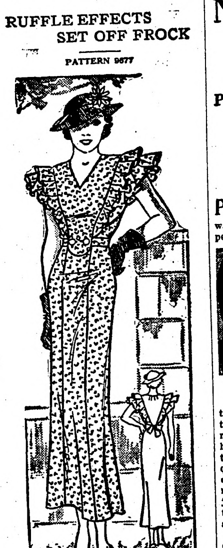
RUFFLE EFFECTS SET OFF FROCK

PATTERN 9677



If you choose your frocks with an eye to flattery you'll be sure to like the feminine details of this one. The front bodice panel brings to mind a "tucker," in the way it is stitched on top of the skirt. Ruffles outline the panels front and back, and the sleeves in ruffle effect are gracefully flared in keeping with the mood. A frock that is really slenderizing and a gem for these many informal affairs of the season. It is lovely fashioned of a dainty voile, dimity, lawn or swiss, or one of the gay, new silk prints.

Pattern 9677 may be ordered only in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38 and 40. Size 16 requires 3½ yards 39 inch fabric.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Send your order to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 232 West Eighteenth Street, New York, N. Y.

President Calls for Truce Between Labor and Industry—Convention of A. F. of L.—Air Combat Forces Taken Away From Foulois.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

President Roosevelt

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S latest radio talk with his fellow citizens was well written, well delivered and peculiarly vague as to his future intentions. He sought to reassure business and labor, both of which are questioning him anxiously, but he made no definite replies to their categorical queries. His one specific statement was that within a month he would seek to negotiate a truce between large groups of employers and large groups of employees through which there would be a cessation of the strikes that have been disrupting the nation's business. He said he would ask the representatives of those forces to agree temporarily on questions of wages, hours and working conditions, and that with such agreements in force he expected further adjustments would be made peaceably, through governmental or private mediation.

"I shall not ask either employers or employees permanently to lay aside the weapons common to industrial war," he added. "But I shall ask both groups to give a fair trial to peaceful methods of adjusting their conflicts of opinion and interest, and to experiment for a reasonable time with measures suitable to civilize our industrial civilization."

By way of reply to the appeals of many business, industrial and financial leaders that the more radical measures of the administration's program be abandoned, Mr. Roosevelt declared the New Deal is to go on. To the questions of those leaders concerning balancing of the budget, government expenses, further devaluation of the dollar or return to the gold standard, he made no reply. However, he did declare himself in favor of a system of business based on private profit. Then he said:

"I am not for a return to that definition of liberty under which for many years a free people were being gradually regimented into the service of the privileged few. I prefer and I am sure you prefer that broader definition of liberty under which we are moving forward to greater freedom, to greater security for the average man than he has ever known before in the history of America."

Concerning the NRA, the President gave praise to General Johnson and said the national recovery administration was entering its second phase, "which is in turn a period of preparation for legislation which will determine its permanent form." He admitted there was a question as to the wisdom of some of the devices employed during the first phase of the NRA, but decried the attacks on the constitutionality of many of the things his administration has done. "We are not," he said, "frightened by reactionary lawyers or political editors. All these cries have been heard before."

Near the beginning of his address, the President said:

"I am happy to report that after years of uncertainty, culminating in the collapse of the spring of 1933, we are bringing order out of the old chaos with a greater certainty of the employment of labor at a reasonable wage and of more business at a fair profit. These governmental and industrial developments hold promise of new achievements for the nation."

First formal response to the President's speech came from the National Association of Manufacturers, which urged him to issue a proclamation for a "truce on industrial warfare" during which existing employment relations would be continued, and challenged the American Federation of Labor to take like action. Its statement said:

"The President will find employers willing to sit down with him, as he proposes, to devise means for ending the constant series of strikes which have been one of the major obstacles to recovery."

Green and Morrison, respectively president and secretary of the federation, said this was a subterfuge and that the manufacturers should first publicly announce they would obey the decisions of constituted authorities, especially concerning discrimination and collective bargaining.

WHILE President William Green and some other leaders of the American Federation of Labor, just convened in San Francisco, expressed approval of what Mr. Roosevelt said in his radio address, many others prominent in the federation are far from satisfied with the way things are going. The executive council's annual report devoted pages to an analysis of the effect of the NRA upon the interests of labor. Almost without exception, the effects were found either directly harmful or at least unsatisfactory.

The criticism was directed at the workings of the recovery program, in actual operation. The NRA and the New Deal itself were not condemned.

But the committee indicted the program on these main grounds:

That it has failed to increase the purchasing power of workers.

That because it has failed to reduce hours of labor sufficiently it has also failed to create a satisfactory number of new jobs.

That its compliance machinery is ineffective, with the result that violations of the spirit of the codes are easily accomplished and quite general.

Labor does not have proper representation in either code enforcement or administration.

"In one way," the report says, pointing to what seems to be viewed as the only satisfactory accomplishment thus far under the NRA, "codes have fulfilled expectations. They have with few exceptions wiped out child labor."

PRESIDENT GREEN in his address to the Federation of Labor declared the establishment of the 30-hour week was one of the possible means of wiping out unemployment, and said those opposing it have offered no other remedy. First actual results in the campaign for this were announced later to the convention by Frank Feeney, president of the Elevator Constructors' union. What he called the "greatest labor document ever written" has been signed—a five-year agreement with contractor employers providing the six-hour day, five-day week for the 19,000 members of the union on a pay basis of the eight-hour day. The contract will become effective immediately, Feeney said, in any locality in which any other four of the building trades unions negotiate similar agreements.

William Green

The document also provides for an absolutely closed shop and gives the elevator constructors the right to strike at any time to support any movement for the 30-hour week.

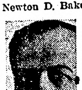
While the delegates were cheering this announcement, Col. W. F. Axton, tobacco manufacturer of Louisville, Ky., arose and made a lively speech in support of the 30-hour week as the means of getting everybody back to work.

"If we want to get business back we must give employment to labor," Axton said. "Industry at the same time must be protected from unfair competition by such means as codes."

The arrival of John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, gave impetus to the fight for extension of the A. F. of L. into the industrial union field and to the plan to increase the executive council from 11 to 25 members.

Although Lewis, controlling 3,000 convention votes, was opposed by Green on the council plan, the miners' leader removed the last doubt concerning Green's re-election by announcing that he would not only back Green but would place him in nomination.

FOLLOWING the recommendations of a special committee appointed by the War department and headed by Newton D. Baker, the department has created a general headquarters air force, comprising all the air combat forces, and placed it under the direct command of Gen. Douglas MacArthur, chief of staff. Thus all the fighting planes are taken away from Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois, chief of the air corps, and he is left in command of only the army air schools and air depots. "Benny," who flew with the Wrights in 1909 and worked his way to high command, has long been at outs with the general staff, struggling against what he considered its intrigues and politics. Now the general staff is having its way with him and, as one Washington commentator says, instead of the flying air fighter which his record fitted him to be, he has become a desk soldier and a school teacher.



Gen. Foulois

Just as this order was issued Brig. Gen. William Mitchell, former chief of the air corps and a perpetual storm center, was testifying before the commission appointed by the President to study the government's aviation problem.

Mitchell called the organization of a "GHQ" air force "a lot of bunk," and he declared that all army officers who signed the Baker report should be "kicked out of the service." He referred to army aviation plans as the work of "Boy Scouts" in the War department.

According to Mitchell, these are the measures the country should adopt for its aerial defense:

Merge army, navy, and all air services under one command.

Build planes with a cruising radius of 6,000 to 8,000 miles.

Make detailed plans for war, including the evacuation of New York city in case of an air attack by Japan "from a base in Alaska."

Construct dirigibles, for 50 of them "competently" handled could destroy Japan within two days.

REMODELING of the NRA by the new industrial recovery board which has displaced General Johnson is under way. One of the board's first official acts was to give a good job to Kilbourne Johnston, son of the retiring administrator—though he spells his name differently. The young man, who is an army lieutenant on leave, was made acting divisional administrator in charge of manufacturing codes.

Donald R. Richberg, director of the industrial emergency committee, who clashed repeatedly with Johnson when he was active as chief counsel of the recovery agency, intimated if there had been wounds they were now healed.

"We have no quarrel," Richberg said with a smile.

On behalf of the textile workers Francis J. Gorman formally accepted the President's plan for an industrial truce. He suggested a six-months' armistice and promised that during that period the union would permit "no stoppage of work" in protest against any findings of the textile or national labor relations boards. At the same time Gorman warned that "renewal of conflict" was imminent unless the peaceful methods suggested by the executive could be brought into "swift and effective action."

ONCE more talk of war with Russia is agitating Japan, stirred up by a remarkably frank pamphlet put out by the Japanese army department.

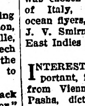
"Soviet Russia possesses 3,000 war planes, the United States 3,000 and China, 500," the pamphlet asserted. "If these nations combined, the air froces of the powers surrounding Japan would total more than 6,000 planes.

"Although diplomacy can give assurance that we will meet only one enemy, we must assume that the enemy will have at least 3,000 planes. Japan has only 1,000 planes. Can our armaments be said to be complete with this poor air force?

"Constant trouble along the Soviet-Manchukuan frontier, the increasingly challenging attitude of the Soviets and Russia's traditional unreliability make the future of Russo-Japanese relations uncertain."

THE world air congress convened at Washington, and one of the most important events on its program was the award to Wiley Post of the International Aeronautical Federation's annual gold medal for the outstanding aviation feat of 1933. For his solo flight around the world Post was chosen over Marshal Italo Balbo of Italy, the Lithuanian-American ocean flyers, Darius and Girenas, and J. V. Smirnoff, heroic Holland-Dutch East Indies mail pilot.

INTERESTING, though not highly important, is the report that comes from Vienna that Mustapha Kemal Pasha, dictator-president of Turkey, may marry one of the four unmarried sisters of King Zog of Albania. Zog is to visit Ankara soon and the engagement may be announced then. Kemal, who is fifty-seven years old, divorced his first wife, Latife Hanoum, in 1925, and is said to have expressed a wish to re-marry. King Zog's marriageable sisters range in age from twenty-three to twenty-six. The Albanian royal family, like Kemal, is of the Moslem faith.



President Kemal

Rumors of another almost royal marriage come from Paris. The Pariser Tageblatt, German refugee newspaper, says Chancellor Hitler contemplates taking as his bride a German princess, one of the family of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha which is allied to the crowns of half a dozen European countries. It adds that the fuehrer at the same time will assume the title of "duke of the Germans."

HARVARD university doesn't like Chancellor Hitler's treatment of Germany's educational institutions. Dr. Ernst F. S. Hanfstaengl, Hitler's confidential aid and himself a graduate of Harvard, made an offer to the university of a German traveling scholarship, but it was declined.

James Bryant Conant, president of Harvard, said in a letter to Hanfstaengl:

"We are unwilling to accept a gift from one who has been so closely associated with the leadership of a political party which has inflicted damage on the universities of Germany through measures which have struck at principles we believe to be fundamental to universities throughout the world."

SAMUEL INSULL and sixteen of his former associates in public utilities are now on trial in the federal court in Chicago. They are charged with having used the mails to defraud investors through the sale of $143,000,000 in securities of the Corporation Securities company. Judge James H. Wilkerson is presiding over the trial and United States District Attorney Dwight H. Green heads the force of prosecutors. Selection of the jury didn't take long, but it was certain the trial of the case would consume weeks for the witnesses are numbered by hundreds.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT and his naval advisers held a conference at the White House, and now Norman H. Davis, ambassador at large, is on his way back across the Atlantic to take part in talks in London preliminary to the international naval conference. Presumably he is all primed to insist on the President's policies. With Mr. Davis goes Admiral William H. Standley, chief of naval operations.

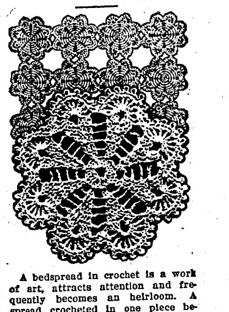
Crochet Motif for Bedspread



A bedspread in crochet is a work of art, attracts attention and frequently becomes an heirloom. A spread crocheted in one piece becomes cumbersome as the work progresses. How much simpler to crochet one motif at a time and then assemble the motifs to complete spread. Watch your work grow when it can be taken along with you to social gatherings.

The above illustration represents the "Snow Flake" motif and how it shows up when put together. This motif when made of carpet warp measures six inches. Thirty-two motifs can be made from one pound of warp. This is only one of the 29 motifs shown in our book No. 27 on motif bedspreads. These motifs can also be used to make match sets for bedroom: curtains, pillows, chair-backs, scarfs, etc.

Write our crochet department inclosing 15c for this book No. 27, illustrated, with instructions, or send 25c and receive also book No. 26, with 72 edgings and insertions in crochet for all purposes.

When preparing fruit salad, sprinkle bananas, pears, and apples with lemon juice or marinate them with french dressing as soon as they are cut. This prevents that undesired discoloration.

Age 13

Old enough for strong drugs?

It is not wise to give a laxative of adult strength to a child, just because you give it less often or in less amounts.

Stomach upsets and bowel troubles of growing children can often be traced to this single mistake.

There is a better way to relieve those occasional sluggish spells or constipation in a child of any age:

Use a liquid laxative containing senna (a natural laxative). California Syrup of Figs has the right amount for children's use, and this rich, fruity syrup does not harm or upset a child's system.

Doctors advise liquid laxatives, and hospitals use the liquid form. Almost any child who has been convalescing in the hospital usually comes out with bowels working like a well-regulated watch.

Make the change now to pure, California Syrup of Figs instead of harsh medicines, you won't risk any more violence to your child's appetite, digestion, and general physical condition. Those little upsets and complaints just disappear as a rule and the child is soon normal and happy again.

THE "LIQUID TEST." First: select a liquid laxative of the proper strength for children. Second: give the dose suited to the child's age. Third: reduce the dose, if repeated, until the bowels are moving without any help at all.

An ideal laxative for this purpose is the pure California Syrup of Figs, but be sure the word "California" is on the bottle.

ADDITIONAL ROUTES.

Whenever, either by reason of the creation of a new county, or by reason of the change of the county seat of any existing county, any city or village not a county seat at the time of the adoption of this amendment is lawfully constituted the county seat of any county, the legislature is authorized to add to the trunk highway system such additional routes connecting such newly constituted county seats with other county seats and other points in the state.

When after at least seventy-five (75) per cent of the total number of the miles of the routes embraced in the trunk highway system hereinbefore specified shall have been constructed and permanently improved, the legislature shall have authority to add new routes to such trunk highway system; provided, however, that no such new routes shall be added until and unless the funds available for the construction, improvement and maintenance of such additional routes shall be sufficient therefor in addition to the construction, improvement and maintenance of the several routes hereinbefore specifically described."

If amended as proposed by the legislature this section will read exactly the same as it now reads except that the last paragraph now appearing in this section will be omitted therefrom, and in the place of and instead of the paragraph so omitted will appear a paragraph which reads as follows:

"The legislature shall have authority to add new routes to such trunk highway system. All new routes added to the trunk highway system by act of the legislature during the session of 1933, are hereby ratified and confirmed, Provided, however, that no such new routes shall be added after the adoption of this amendment, until and unless at least seventy-five (75) per cent of the total number of the miles of the routes embraced in the trunk highway system heretofore created and established either by Article 16 of the Constitution of the State of Minnesota or by the legislature under and pursuant to said Article 16 shall have been constructed and permanently improved."

The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The purpose and effect of this amendment is to ratify and confirm the establishment of all new routes added to the trunk highway system by the 1933 legislature, and to give the legislature unrestricted authority to add new routes to the trunk highway system after seventy-five (75) per cent of the total number of the miles of the routes established by Article 16 of the State Constitution and established by the legislature acting pursuant thereto, prior to the time this amendment was proposed, have been constructed and permanently improved.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 2.

By the adoption of Chapter 441 of the Laws of 1933, the legislature has proposed an amendment to Section 10 of Article 9 of the State Constitution.

This section now reads as follows:

"The credit of the state shall never be given or loaned in aid of any individual, association or corporation, except as hereinafter provided. Nor shall there be any further issue of bonds denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad Bonds,' under what purports to be an amendment to section ten (10) of article nine (9) of the Constitution, adopted April 15, 1858, which is hereby expunged from the Constitution, saving, excepting and reserving to the state, nevertheless, all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment. Provided, however, that for the purpose of developing the agricultural resources of the state, the state may establish and maintain a system of rural credits and thereby loan money and extend credit to the people of the state upon real estate security in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by law, and to issue and negotiate bonds to provide money to be so loaned. The limit of indebtedness contained in section 5 of this article shall not apply to the provisions of this section, and the purposes for which the credit of the state or the aforesaid municipal subdivisions thereof may be given or loaned as herein provided are declared to be public purposes."

If amended as proposed by the legislature this section will read as follows:

"The credit of the state shall never be given or loaned in aid of any individual, association or corporation, except as hereinafter provided. Nor shall there be any further issue of bonds denominated 'Minnesota State Railroad Bonds,' under what purports to be an amendment to Article 9, Section 10 of the Constitution, adopted April 15th, 1858, which is hereby expunged from the Constitution, saving, excepting and reserving to the state, nevertheless, all rights, remedies and forfeitures accruing under said amendment. Provided, however, that for the purpose of developing the agricultural resources of the state, the state may establish and maintain a system of rural credits and thereby loan money and extend credit to the people of the state upon real estate security in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by law, and to issue and negotiate bonds to provide money to be so loaned. The limit of indebtedness contained in Section 5 of this article shall not apply to the provisions of this section, and the purposes for which the credit of the state or the aforesaid municipal subdivisions thereof may be given or loaned as herein provided are declared to be public purposes.

The legislature may authorize the taxing of any lands, title to which is acquired by the state through the operation of such system of rural credits, during the period such lands are held by the state, and for the assessment thereof for benefits arising from improvement, and may provide for the payment of such taxes and assessments out of the operation of such system of rural credits. In lieu of such taxation the legislature may appropriate to the school districts, towns, counties, cities, villages and boroughs in which such lands are located sums of money not exceeding the amounts which would have been realized by such governmental subdivisions from the assessment against or taxation of such lands if privately owned."

It will be noted that the present Section 10 of Article 9 remains unchanged as the first paragraph of the proposed amendment but that a second paragraph is added to said section.

The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to give the legislature the power to do one of two things which it now lacks the constitutional power to do, namely: first, to authorize the taxing of any land, and the assessment of benefits for improvements against any land, which the state has acquired and owns or may acquire and own through the operation of the system of rural credits and to provide for the payment of such taxes and assessments out of the funds of the Rural Credit Department; or, second, to appropriate to the counties, towns, school districts, cities, villages and boroughs in which are located lands acquired and owned by the state under the rural credit acts sums of money not exceeding the amounts which would be realized by said governmental subdivisions from the taxation of such lands and from the assessment of benefits against such lands if owned by private persons.

Under the Rural Credit Act the state has become the owner of thousands of farms located in various counties of the state. As our State Constitution now stands, such land, being owned by the state, cannot be taxed. It naturally follows that other land within the same taxing district must pay higher taxes.

Likewise, the legislature does not now have the power to appropriate to the counties, towns, school districts, cities, villages and boroughs any funds of the Rural Credit Department to reimburse them for losses suffered by them because large areas of land acquired by the state under the rural credit law thereby have been removed from the tax rolls.

The effect of the passing of this amendment, if the power thereby given is acted upon by the legislature, will be to make good to these local subdivisions, in whole or in part, the loss they now suffer because they cannot tax rural credit land.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 3.

By the adoption of Chapter 442 of the Laws of 1933, the legislature has proposed an amendment to Section 1 of Article 9 of the State Constitution.

This section now reads as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, and public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of a family, as the legislature may determine: Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

If amended as proposed by the legislature, this section will read as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of a family, and household goods and farm machinery, as the legislature may determine:

Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The purpose and effect of this amendment is to grant to the legislature, in addition to the power now granted by said section to exempt personal property, the authority to exempt from taxation, such household goods of each household, and such farm machinery of each farm, as it may see fit. By the present Section 1 of Article 9 the legislature is granted the authority to exempt from taxation unspecified personal property not exceeding in value $200 for each household, individual, or head of a family.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 4.

By the adoption of Chapter 418 of the Laws of 1933 the legislature has proposed an amendment to Article 8 of the State Constitution. This amendment will not add to or alter any existing section of the Constitution, but will add a new section to be known as Section 8 of Article 8. The proposed amendment reads as follows:

"Any of the public lands of the state, including lands held in trust for any purpose, may, with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor, be exchanged for lands of the United States and other privately owned lands as the legislature may provide, and the lands so acquired shall be subject to the trust, if any, to which the lands exchanged therefor were subject, and the state shall reserve all mineral and water and water power rights in lands so transferred by the state."

The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The purpose and effect of this amendment is to authorize the legislature to provide for exchanging any of the public lands of the state for lands of the United States and land privately owned, such exchanges to be made with the approval of a commission consisting of the governor, the attorney general and the state auditor. Such exchanges of land cannot now be made because the State Constitution does not permit the legislature to authorize the sale of school lands, state swamp lands and state internal improvement lands except by public sale. One immediate purpose in granting such authority is to make it possible for the state to acquire compact areas of land for forestry and other conservation purposes by exchanging land outside of such conservation areas for lands of the United States and privately owned lands within such areas.

The amendment requires that all mineral rights, water rights and water power rights in lands so transferred by the state shall be reserved. The land so acquired will become subject to the same trust, if any, as the land disposed of. For example, if school land is given in exchange, the land received will become school land.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT NO. 5.

By the adoption of Chapter 441 of the Laws of 1933, the legislature proposed an amendment to Section 1 of Article 9 of the State Consitution. At present Section 1 of Article 9 reads as follows:

"The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but pub-

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a faculty position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer meets Prof. Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy. At the school the group is struck by an air of mystery pervading the place. Gordon Haskell, proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne completes the Academy faculty. In a schoolroom Janet finds a group which the teachers had supposed were scholars, are wax figures. Haskell explains unusual circumstances connected with the conduct of the Academy. Among the pupils is Berenice Bracebridge, daughter of the late owner of the school. The story of the tragedy of Lostland Academy is that of two sisters and two brothers of Berenice, who lost their lives in the water, at the same moment, some years ago. The wax figures were modeled in the likenesses of the four children, and Doctor Bracebridge's will provided that they must be preserved. Payne learns from Berenice that the uncouth giant whom Janet had seen with Haskell is named Balder, and is a valuable servant.

CHAPTER IV

—12—

About a week later Wilton was directed by one of his scholars to the Moore farm, and after much climbing he found himself at a five-bar gate which closed the farm lane from the road. The house stood back on a knoll and had a row of thorn locusts before its gray, weather-beaten shingled front. An old man was sawing wood in the bleak house yard. His blue eyes had the childlike expression seen sometimes in the eyes of the old when they have been neither very successful nor important in life. Wilton introduced himself, and after some preliminaries he spoke of the academy and of his new relation to it. The old man seemed at once interested, and ushered him into the warm little kitchen. Having dislodged a sleek gray cat from the rocking chair and shaken out the cushion, he invited his visitor to be seated. Wilton gradually approached the subject of the accident, and remarked: "I believe you were the only witness?"

"I was—the sole and only one. I was walking up the ravine on the other side, an ax on my shoulder, when I heard screams and saw the four clawing at each other and at the air to keep from falling into the whirl! But they was tied together, and over they went. You seen the figures, I suppose?"

"Yes."

"The father, the old professor, took on dreadful—they made them figures to keep him quiet in his long sickness."

"So I understand."

"I ain't never seen 'em myself. Folks do say they're too natural. I ain't never wanted to see 'em! I chopped off a great bough that day—and tried to hold it out over the whirl; but I was on the wrong side, and they couldn't reach it. Then I ran down a piece to cross—current knocked me over twice—and I nearly drowned myself. When I got over that at last, nothin' to be seen but that poisonous black water. I was sick at my stomach; I sat down on a rock and was as sick as a drunkard—just because I hadn't been able to do nothin'. I staggered back to the academy, and the first person I see was Balder hoeing in the garden. 'Balder,' I says, the first thing, "four of 'em—the whole four of 'em—drowned.' Balder let out a screech and threw down his hoe. 'It'll kill the doctor! He's a sick man.'

"Then he went in, and I stood outside shakin' like I had the palsy. Such a screechin' and moanin' and runnin' around. I hear it yet sometimes. Mr. Haskell had been readin' to the doctor all afternoon; and he tried to quiet him, but it was no use. He got worse and worse. Folks said his brain was affected. There's an old lady over to the Herropp farm helped nurse the doctor. She used to say she didn't blame Mrs. Bracebridge for tryin' to bring those children to life in wax—it was enough to wring your heart to hear the poor old professor callin' for 'em. Folks say—" he hesitated. "Folks say the wax figures comes out of that schoolroom and walks the old corridors and look in the library and even go out on the grounds."

"Nonsense!"

"Well, the place has been runnin' down ever since their deaths. 'Twas a queer will—keeping the figures until she's twenty-one. She is a nice lass—brings me a roast chicken or a glass of jell sometimes. She says she's grateful to me for tryin' to save their lives. What's the use of that if I didn't do it. My old dog—Caesar—here she is now—who's that with her?"

Payne looked out the window. "That's her big St. Bernard."

"I didn't mean no dog. I thought I saw a girl in white walking with her." Jerry opened the kitchen door and went out to meet Berenice. "The new teacher's callin' on me," he announced.

She seemed glad to see him, presented her offerings to Jerry—petted the cat. Payne asked if he could go back with her. As they walked along she asked him why he had gone to see Jerry. Taken aback for a moment, he considered how he should answer her.

"I like to talk with all kinds of people," Wilton answered. "Ah, here is the deserted village. Does anyone know why it was deserted?"

"People gave various reasons. The location was too lonely, I suppose."

"The last deserted city I saw was Niufa, in Italy. Imagine a city of towers, churches, palaces, piazzas, utterly empty except for a riot of flowers; deserted since the middle of the Eighteenth century. Why, here comes Miss Mercer and Mr. Fleming."

Janet and Arthur waved to them gaily, came up the rough road with swift eager feet.

"What do you suppose we've discovered—there are tablets in that old church; and one of them is to a Dr. August Lostland, founder of Lostland academy, who died in the year 1799 aged nearly one hundred."

Janet and Berenice had clasped hands on meeting as if their vitality and youth went naturally in search of a comrade. Wilton thought he had never seen two young women who so seemed to heighten each other's beauty. The blue and brown eyes shone with mutual friendliness. Berenice's swaying grace, her etherealized look, the aura of seclusion and isolation surrounding her, blended well with Janet's warmer beauty, its secrets to be revealed in other avenues than the long classic roads of English literature.

"You should be well educated, Miss Bracebridge," Fleming said, "with the four of us always buzzing about."

"I shall be very happy," she answered simply. "Would you like to see the old church, too?" she addressed Wilton.

The old meeting house was built in the Christopher Wren style of architecture, with galleries and a choir loft; the Ten Commandments facing on one side of the pulpit and the Lord's Prayer on the other. The four climbed to the choir loft, and from their position above a circular clock surveyed the high, square pews. As they stood there a figure appeared in the doorway left open at the other end, and Gordon Haskell stepped cautiously over the sill.

"Stand back," Berenice whispered. "I'll lean over the railing. He'll be so surprised." She took off her hat and waited until he was nearly beneath the gallery; then without a word stood by the rail looking down at him. He gazed up at her—grew very white and turned abruptly.

"Guardian," she called, "Don't you know me? It's Berenice!"

Either he did not hear her or did not want to hear her, for he strode out of the building. She turned with a puzzled air. "He saw me—he must have seen me."

Wilton was sure he had seen her; also that he looked like a man thoroughly frightened. Had he mistaken her for some one else?

"I wonder what Mr. Haskell wanted? I don't ever remember seeing him enter this place. He looked at me as if he thought me a ghost. I suppose in this dim light I had a strange appearance. I did not mean to frighten him."

Before she ceased speaking heavy footsteps were heard coming down the staircase of the belfry. "This place seems a kind of Mecca this afternoon," Janet remarked. Arthur and Wilton exchanged glances with an unspoken mutual agreement that to stay just where they were was the thing to do. The footsteps had stopped midway of the descent, and they heard a kind of growling sound, as if a man were angry with some absent individual. Then the footsteps began again, and in the aisle finally appeared the hulking form of Balder. He lurched rather than walked down the aisle, and was out in the air before they had quite recovered themselves.

"My guardian was probably hunting Balder. He often goes up in that tower, Martha says—though how she knows it I don't know, unless Balder tells her. I wonder if he keeps a treasure chest up there?"

Voices reached them. They heard Haskell say: "I've caught you at last—you ruffian."

A growling bass replied: "You are always spying on me—you are! You didn't stay long in the church, did you!"

"Let's see the belfry," Janet said, to divert attention from this conversation.

They began the ascent of the narrow, winding stairs, the men first—Janet and Berenice dodging cobwebs and holding the folds of their skirts from the dust. The almost ladder-like stairs ended at a platform and a closed door. Arthur turned the handle. "Locked. Here, Wilton, we return."

"I wonder if Balder keeps his valuables in here—barring fire, I should think it would be a very safe bank."

"He has no right to lock this door," Berenice said. "The meeting house is no one's property now—unless mine. Mr. Haskell told me once that years ago this village was on the academy land, the inhabitants held ground leases." They stood looking at the closed door for a moment, then Janet turned down. The four walked up the road together in the wild beauty of the sunset, Janet wishing that they could always go on like this—young and hopeful and undisturbed.

Haskell was strolling about the grounds of the academy when they reached them, and stopping to admire the handsome beds of chrysanthemums.

YOUTH SLAYS GIRL IN REAL LIFE AS IN POPULAR NOVEL

Murder Case Parallels That Told in Dreiser's "An American Tragedy."

Wilkes-Barre, Pa.—An American tragedy—greater in scope than Theodore Dreiser's book of that name, because it is real, not written—is to read on to its last bitter chapter here when Robert Edwards, twenty-two, goes on trial for his life, accused of slaying his sweetheart, Freda McKechnie, an expectant mother.

All of the slow-moving drama that was Dreiser's will become swiftly-motivated action when the newspapers print the courtroom story of a real American tragedy, a case parallel to the original story in almost every detail.

As Told in Novel

Fiction, in several lines, author Theodore Dreiser; Clyde Griffiths, son of an itinerant street preacher, falls in love with a pretty factory girl, Roberta Alden. Soon afterward, through well-to-do relatives, he meets another girl, Sondra Finchley, prosperous, of social status, with whom he becomes infatuated. Meanwhile Roberta becomes an expectant mother. The situation makes him desperate; he attempts a tragic solution—striking Roberta on the head while boating on a small lake, causing her death by drowning. Finis is the electric chair.

Fact, in a paragraph or two: Robert Edwards, twenty-three-year-old church worker of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., falls in love with young Freda McKechnie, promises to marry her. Into the picture then comes another girl, Margaret Crain, intellectual, music teacher, of East Aurora, N. Y. Meanwhile Freda becomes an expectant mother.

In Real Life

The situation makes Edwards desperate; he attempts a tragic solution—striking Freda on the head with a blackjack while they are swimming, causing her death by drowning. The finish has not yet been written.

So much for the skeleton details. The authorities are convinced that Miss Crain was an unwitting incident in the crime. They say that Freda confidently expected to become young Edwards' bride, so much so, according to a friend, "until the very end she was more happy than she had been in months." This friend said further that Freda knew of Edwards' infatuation for Miss Crain, but had been assured by him that he had gotten over that infatuation.

The last night she lived, when she left home to keep a tryst with Edwards, Freda told this girl friend: "I have a date with Bobby and we're going to talk over the plans for our wedding. Everything is going to be all right."

After the murder, police say, Edwards returned to his home, slept soundly, and the next day or so visited Freda's family. They were deeply alarmed over her absence, but at the time the youth denied knowing where she was or what had happened to her. Finally police got on the case and Edwards confessed. He killed Freda, he explained, when she threatened to expose their romance to Miss Crain.

Superintendent Boasts of Using Grafted Foot

Springfield, Mo.—W. L. Tracer of St. Louis, construction company superintendent here, claims he is one of four men in world medical history to be walking on a grafted artificial foot.

The operation was performed, he said, during the World war after his own foot had been shot off at the ankle by a burst of shrapnel fire. Another man's foot was attached to his leg by a Major Wheeler, a medical corps officer assigned for Nice, France.

The new foot, he said, had to be broken and reset after he had returned to America because it had not grown straight.

Tracer walks with only a slight limp and says the foot pains him only after a hard day's work.

Fire in Range Disturbs Squirrels; One Dies

New York.—When fifteen-year-old Jack Hare built a fire for the first time in a year in a kitchen range in his home in Patchogue, he heard frantic squeals of protest.

As he lifted the stove lid he saw a mother squirrel scurry up the chimney, leaving behind three new-born squirrels.

One little fellow's paws were burned badly. Jack put the three in a box under a tree. They squealed so loudly that he put them to sleep with etherized gum used in his model aircraft work.

A few hours later two were missing. The mother had carried them away. One died.

Patriotism Is All Wet if Canoeist Stands Up

Dedham, Mass.—The echoes of "The Star-Spangled Banner" died away slowly and the crowd ashore still stood bare-headed in tribute as a police boat on the Charles river pulled into dock.

In the bow sat a silent, wet, shivering New Yorker, and in the stern sat another.

The bow rider stepped ashore and from the stern a voice still gurgling a bit snarled:

"That's what you get by being so d——d patriotic that you gotta stand in a canoe."

NOTHING SACRED TO POLITICIANS

Times Have Changed Little Since Days of Rome.

Political campaigners of today may find precedents for their methods in the tactics used by the Roman candidates who canvassed for votes from the Alps to the toe of Italy in the days of the ancient republic. The striking similarity between political practices of 2,000 years ago and those of today, says the Kansas City Star, is evidence of the truth of the contention of Guglielmo Ferrero, modern historian of ancient Rome, that every phase of modern western civilization has its counterpart in the history of the Romans.

Nobles clattering along the Appian way in their chariots, and solitary travelers passing more slowly on foot, in the spring of 64 B. C., may have been bored by the continual repetition of such posters as "Vote for M. Tullius Cicero for the Consulship," just as modern travelers are by innumerable exhortations to support the many candidates for sheriff.

Roman candidates lacked the convenience of telephone poles on which to display their messages to the traveler, but tombstones served the purpose just as well, for the Romans customarily buried the ashes of their dead at the roadsides. Candidates utilized the tombstones, not always, it seems, with the approval of the dead person's family. A stone has been found near Rome bearing this inscription:

"Billposter, I beg you to pass this monument by. If any candidate's name shall have been painted upon it may he suffer defeat and may he never win any office."

Town dwellers expressed their political sympathies by means of inscriptions painted in large letters on the stucco walls of their houses. About 1,500 such signs have been uncovered at Pompeii, many of which reveal interesting political tactics of the day. There are three which show that Romans were not averse to a little satirical mud-slinging in public. These signs must have been annoying to the candidate in question, a certain Vatia, who was running for the aedileship, an office corresponding to the modern police commissioner. "All the sleepy men nomibate Vatia as aedile," says one of the signs. "The petty thieves propose Vatia for the aedileship," says the second. And the third is no more complimentary: "I ask your support for M. Cerrinius Vatia for the aedileship. All the drinkers nominate him."

Forests of the Sea

Trunks of seaweed 18 inches in circumference, with branches and leaves like a tree, were discovered recently by a botanist in the Antarctic ocean, notes a writer in Tit-Bits Magazine. It remains to be proved whether they can be used as firewood.

Unmapped jungles of vegetation lie beneath the waves. Dr. William Beebe, the marine explorer, glimpsed a real forest of seaweed when investigating, in his bathysphere, the continental shelf of the coast of Chile. Some of the stems towered to a height of 600 feet, three times higher than the world's tallest tree. Inexperienced voyagers often mistake the enormous drifting masses of seaweed that appear at their thickest every summer in the Sargasso sea for islands. Their total weight on the surface has been scientifically estimated at 20,000,000 tons, while another 54,000,000 tons is said to lie below.

In the Bermudas

Bermuda is a group of islands in the North Atlantic, 660 miles southeast of New York. Although said to be 365 in number, of which about a score are inhabited, they occupy a space only 18 by 2½ miles. The largest has an area of 9,000 acres, and the whole group contains 12,000 acres.

Why Hospitals Use a Liquid Laxative

Hospitals and doctors have always used liquid laxatives. And the public is fast returning to laxatives in liquid form. Do you know the reasons?

The dose of a liquid laxative can be measured. The action can thus be regulated to suit individual need. It forms no habit; you need not take a "double dose" a day or two later. Nor will a mild liquid laxative irritate the kidneys.

The right dose of a liquid laxative brings a more natural movement, and there is no discomfort at the time, or after.

The wrong cathartic may often do more harm than good.

A properly prepared liquid laxative like Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin brings safe relief from constipation. It gently helps the average person's bowels until nature restores them to regularity. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is an approved liquid laxative which all druggists keep ready for use. It makes an ideal family laxative; effective for all ages, and may be given the youngest child.

ic burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, and public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of a family, as the legislature may determine: Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of railroads."

If amended as proposed by the legislature, said section will read as follows: "The power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended or contracted away. Taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and shall be levied and collected for public purposes, but public burying grounds, public school houses, public hospitals, academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning, all churches, church property and houses of worship, institutions of purely public charity, and public property used exclusively for any public purpose, shall be exempt from taxation, and there may be exempted from taxation personal property not exceeding in value $200, for each household, individual or head of a family as the legislature may determine. Provided, that the legislature may authorize municipal corporations to levy and collect assessments for local improvements upon property benefited thereby without regard to a cash valuation, and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, modify or repeal any existing law providing for the taxation of the gross earnings of a railroad."

The Purpose and Effect of the Proposed Amendment

The purpose and effect of this amendment is to mention specifically and define definitely the property of academies, colleges, universities and seminaries of learning which shall be exempt from taxation. The present Section 1 of Article 9 provides that academies, colleges, universities, and all seminaries of learning shall be exempt from taxation, but does not specifically state what property of such institutions shall be tax exempt. If the proposed amendment is adopted the only property of said educational institutions which will be exempt from taxation under this section will be the property actually and exclusively used in the instruction and housing of the students thereof and residences on the campus actually occupied by instructors of such institutions.

Attention has been called to another serious accident where one of the drivers involved was drunk while driving.

I have become very bitter towards this practice and the apparent negligence of the law to spot these drivers. There seems to be absolutely no bit of common sense left in a man's mind who will soak himself with alcoholic liquors and then go out on our highways to kill innocent victims. The laws of the various states should be so worded that where an accident occurs under these conditions, very serious punishment will be meted out to such drivers and their permit to drive an automobile removed for life. this may be rigid and strict but think of the lives that it has cost thus far.

A drunken driver should be off the highways and public opinion is the strongest weapon to do it.

The first real rain of the fall season or all summer for that matter, started here Monday evening and kept up most of the night. Tuesday it rained real hard in the forenoon, with a light drizzle in afternoon. The farmers report that the rain has soaked into the ground way below the plow depth.

The rain was welcome at this time many wells in this community were having a hard time to supply the needs on many of the farms. It is hoped that we may yet enjoy a few warm days and that the grass will have a chance to make a little come-back before it freezes up this fall.

Northwest School News

Saturday, November 3, has been designated Parent's Day at the Northwest School of Agriculture. With the second largest fall term enrollment in the history of the school, it is expected that more than two hundred and fifty parents from fifteen counties and eastern North Dakota will attend the annual celebration. The program will open with the visitation of classes in the forenoon followed by a special parent's day dinner at which time the parents will be guests of the students in the spacious school dining hall.

An elaborate student program is being arranged for the early afternoon. Parents will then inspect the home project exhibits in the physical education building and take part in the social hour which will be attended by all members of the teaching staff

Parents' Day has developed into one of the most interesting events of the year. It enables the fathers and mothers to acquaint themselves with the class and labratory work as well as the dormitory life on the campus

Held Road Meeting

Most of the farmers living along the north township line of the Town of Holt, east of the Trunk Highway; those along the line that runs straight east in line with the Newfolden road to the east township line and those that live along the line running east of the C. E. Smith farm, met at the farm home of Ole and Edward Halsa on Sunday to vote on which of these roads should come first in line for county aid and be improved. Otto J. Johnson, County Commissioner from Grygla was there and had charge of the meeting. Due to the fact that not enough farmers came to the meeting from the territory served by one of the three routes designated, it was decided to leave the project up to the county highway engineer to decide which of the three roads would be the best to fix up so as to serve the most farmers and at the least cost.

Pioneer Farmer Has No Horses, Just Oxen

A recent issue of the Crookston daily times sent to this office by P. L. Anderson of that city, we find the following news item:

A pioneer farmer who clings to the ways of half a century ago has been found. He is Lars Hellesylt, who lives northwest of Holt. There are no such things as motors on Mr. Hellesylt's farm. Even the immediate predecessors of motor power, the horse, is an unknown thing. Mr. Hellesylt uses oxen.

There are two teams on the farm and they do all the work. Not only that, the team of oxen hitched to Mr. Hellesylt's buggy provides the means of transportation for such trips as he makes.

Obituary

Torger J. Ness was born in Nissedal, Tellemarken, Norway, June 9, 1854. He passed away at his old farm home here on Oct. 15, 1934 at the age of 80 years, four month and six days. He was laid to rest in the Holt cemetery by the side of his wife who passed away in July. Mr. Ness was carried to his last resting place by his five sons and one grandson.

While in Norway he was united in marriage to Torbjer Aarehus and to this union eight children were born. His wife and one son preceeded him in death. He immigrated to America in 1902 and bought some land in New Sollom township, Marshall County, near Holt where he was engaged in farming until the fall of 1926 when he moved to Holt with his wife and where they lived until God called them home.

Left to mourn his loss are his seven children. John, Ralph, Olaf, Hans, and Theodore all of Holt, Mrs. Oscar Moline of Crookston and Mrs. Gust Williamson of Greenbush, thirteen grandchildren and one sister in Iowa.

Card of Thanks

We hereby express our thanks to all those who so kindly assisted us and showed us sympathy during the illness and death of our beloved father, to those who sang at the funeral and gave flowers; to Rev. Myhrer and Rev. Jacobson for their comforting words and to those who visited our father when he was ill.

The Ness children and their families.

Mrs. Geo. Smith and children of Fairbanks, Alaska, arrived here Tuesday evening to spend a few months visiting at the home of her mother, Mrs. C. L. Sandberg and other relatives.

Advice of Inspectors

Quality is a very important factor in the production of cream, with inspectors inspecting all butter that comes on the market, for foreign matter such as flies and other things that may get into the cream, which may result in a total loss of some churnings. Let's all work hand in hand to prevent such happenings.

Five Weeks on Wheels
High Lights of An Auto Tour to the West Coast
by Hans O. Hanson
10. Black Hills and Home.

Last week we left you in our travel at the Spanish Diggings in the rough country south of Manville, Wyoming. We spent several hours there looking over the aboriginal stone quarries of prehistoric age. There seems to be no records anywhere as to who the people were that lived there at one time and worked those stone quarries. The kind of gray, hard flint stone such as found there has not yet been discovered any other place.

These Diggins which some are possitive were the work of an tribe of Indians about five-hundred years ago, while others claim it was the home of early Spanish people, covers an area of 10 by 40 miles of rough country from south of Manville to Bull's Bend of the North Platte river near the Sunrise iron mine we visited six miles northwest of Guernsey.

As far back as two hundred years ago, implements, spearheads, arrowheads, tomahawks and utensils made of stone from these quarries were found in Ohio and Pennsylvania and way down in old Mexico. The ground around the diggings or quarries are covered with tepee rings. These rings consist of stones of various sizes laid in circles and had been used to hold down the outer edge of the round rawhide tents in which the tribes lived.

There were thousands of these tepee rings and we could tell that they had been there a long time because, where the small stones were laid on solid rock ledges, they had become cemented together. Geologists claim it takes a good many years to have that process completed by nature. From the looks of the whole works, these quarries had been a wholesale center.

We are back onto the main road and are hitting the high spots at fifty per and the children are counting all the beautiful and curious stones and relics we found among the tepee rings. Some day in years to come we are going back to the Big Horn mountains in Wyoming on a big game hunt. That state has an abundance of all kinds of wild game and is a real paradise for hunters.

Sailing along thru Lusk and northeast we are now headed for Edgemont, South Dakota. At this point we put up for the night at the American Legion tourist camp. Early in the evening while there, we took a strol up town to have a talk with the people about the terrible drouth they were having in that community. The first man we contacted was a Negro who came out to soutwestern South Dakota twenty-four years ago from the city of Chicago and, whom we learned from others, had in the past quarter of a Century become one of the most prosperous farmers in that vicinity. He said this was the hardest drouth he had ever seen there and that he was feeding his stock the grain he had saved from his previous crops. He had a large herd of fine dairy cows that he was trying to keep over the drouth.

The Government had men in the territory buying up thousands of head of cattle and were shipping trainloads night and day to keep them from starving to death on the bare and sunburned ranges. The day we came there the Government men had killed 175 head of young stock that were too weak to ship. The best part of the meat from these was given to the people in Edgemont and community.

We moved on and got into Hot Springs, in the south end of the Black Hills. Although the writer of this story spent several years in South Dakota he never got to the Hills. The Black Hills cover an erea of about a hundred miles north and south, and fifty miles wide. We visited a lot of the old historic places up and down thru the Hills and found them very interesting. A drive up the Needle Highway gave us a real thrill. This road is hewed thru spires of solid granite and reaches an altitude of over 6,000 feet. It is known as the most beautiful ten mile drive in the West It cost $70,000 a mile to build a part of this road. In the Hills they mine fifty kinds of mineral and some of them, like the rose quarts are very beautiful. We drove to the top of Mount Coolidge and it happened to be a clear day and we got a splendid view of the country about us from the observation platform of a 60 foot forest rangers tower on top of the mountain.

We also took a jaunt up thru the pines to Mount Rushmore to see the great stone faces. Gutzon Borglum, world renowned sculptor, is supervising the work of having the status of Washington, Lincoln, Jefferson and Theo Roosevelt carved there in enduring granite on the high mountain side. The size of these statues is 230 feet from waist to brow and they will be there to gaze at the passing travelor for a million years.

A drive around Sylvan Lake soon convinced us that this was the most beautiful little body of water that we saw up in the mountains on the entire trip.

After covering most of the principle points of interest in the Hills, we struck out on our way homeward. We took in the Bad Lands on our way to Huron. The Bad Lands are 90 miles long and 40 miles wide. They are the result of recent, rapid erosion of the White River and its tributaries thru the uplifted sediment on the bottom of a prehistoric lake. It is probably one of the richest of nature's fossil storehouses in the world. Camels roamed there before they were in Egypt. The horse, with his three-toed feet, originated there, smaller than most of our present dogs. The erosion has left three distinct types of formations--the castle type, the pinnacle type, and the dome type. Some of the region is so deeply eroded that that the U. S. Government maps carry the legend, "Too rough to be explored." There are good wide highways in these bad land on which to drive and look at the scenery.

From there on we hit the trail fast as the heat was terriffc in western Dakota. We made the 240 mile drive from Phillip to Huron at night to escape some of the heat. The thermometer showed 90 above at 10 p. m., at Phillip, S. D. We arrived home to Dad and Mother, Mr. and Mrs. Ole Hanson at 5 o'clock in the morning and after a short rest we were treated to some good hot cakes and coffee. After a weeks visit there we sailed up thru Minnesota for home and were glad to be back among the folks in and around Holt. We had a most wonderful trip—End.

Once our county was nearly bankrupt, but today we are in good financial situation; we pay cash as we go on every fund except the poor fund, and it will not be long before we pay cash as we go on that fund. Our 1935 tax year should show a considerable decrease in county tax. I am greatly interested in the welfare of our county and its people, and I would like to continue working for the county and its people for another term.

Gunderson-Klungness

Peter Klungness, son of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Klungness and Miss Bertha Gunderson, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Nils Gunderson of Silver Creek were united in marriage at the Lutheran Parsonage here Saturday evening. Rev. Redal read the ceremony.

Saastad-Miller

Word was received here on Wednesday that Miss Ruth Saastad, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. O. Saastad of this place was united in marriage to Mr. Herbert Miller of St. Paul in that city on Thursday, Oct. 11.

More Highway Work

Bids on road construction projects to cost approximately $460,000 have been called for November 2 by the State Highway Department. The work will include 11 grading projects, 6 gravel jobs, 3 bridges and several monolithic culverts.

The work in this part of the state will be on No. 32 with 19, 530 cubic yards of excavation on 0.7 mile near Red Lake Falls, and 5,780 tons of gravel surfacing on 4.1 miles on Trunk Highway No. 32 between 1 mile north of Gary and 4 miles north of Twin Valley.

The General election is close at hand and it is time for the voters of Marshall county to choose the men that they feel will best serve them in office. Mr. A. C. Swandby, Clerk of tee District Court has served the people of this county for seven terms, 28 years by January first and is again a candidate for re-election to that office

Mr. Swandby is well qualified for the office he seeks and should be re-elected. He has given the people of Marshall County courteous treatment, efficient prompt and personal service during his incumbency in office and his record is one that speaks for itself and merits your support at the polls on Tuesday, Nov. 6.

Assassination of King Alexander and Louis Barthou Alarms All Europe—Spanish Revolt Suppressed—CCC Will Be Continued.

By EDWARD W. PICKARD

© by Western Newspaper Union.

TWO men of great importance in the maintenance of peace in Europe were removed from the scene by the bullets of the assassin, Petrus Kalemen, who slew King Alexander of Jugoslavia and Louis Barthou, French foreign minister, in Marseilles, "Another Sarejevo?" was the question in every mind, and, indeed, there was some slight danger that the crime would start another great war. Alexander was just beginning a "good will" visit in France, which was closely tied up with Barthou's plan for an accord between France and Italy, and Barthou was soon to go to Rome to further the scheme. Jugoslavia is allied to France but is not at all friendly to Italy, and Alexander hated Mussolini personally, believing that the duce gave moral support to the rebellious Croats. But the king did not want war and was willing to help along the proposed accord if it was not inimical to his country.

King Alexander

If trouble does follow after the assassinations it probably will start with revolution in Jugoslavia. Only by assuming and exercising dictatorial powers was Alexander able to keep peace in the hodgepodge that comprises the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, otherwise Jugoslavia, and it is not certain that there is anyone else there who can do it. Civil war might tempt some other nation to intervene and grab part of the realm, and in that case a general conflict might be precipitated.

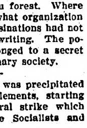
Alexander's eldest son Peter, who was in school in England, was promptly proclaimed king and, being only eleven years old, will rule under a regency of three men who were named in the political will of the murdered monarch. Whether these three can hold the kingdom intact is a question. Only the Serbs are really loyal to the royal house, though all the people had admired the strength and bravery of Alexander, whose life had been attempted four times before.

The death of Alexander was held especially important to Germany by the statesmen of that country, for they had looked to him to curb to a considerable extent the alleged ambitions of Mussolini. He was considered a close friend of the reich and a potential ally.

France was not only worried by the possibility of trouble in the Balkans, but also deeply mourned the death of Barthou, one of her ablest statesmen and, indeed, one of the ablest in Europe. He had been working assiduously on his pet scheme of a security pact for eastern Europe; and, although Germany had scored him for trying to build a diplomatic and economic ring about the reich, last June he personally negotiated an accord between France and Germany that was believed to give assurance of peace.

Petrus Kalemen, the assassin, who was quickly killed by the French police, was found to have been traveling on a forged Czech passport. Two men who accompanied him on his mission of death were captured near the Swiss border and another was being hunted down in Fontainebleau forest. Where they came from and what organization was back of the assassinations had not been learned at this writing. The police thought they belonged to a secret Macedonian revolutionary society.

CIVIL war in Spain was precipitated by the radical elements, starting with a 24-hour general strike which was declared by the Socialists and Communists in answer to the formation of a conservative government by Premier Alejandro Lerroux under the domination of reactionary Catholics. Within a few hours bloody conflicts broke out in many regions, and Catalonia, the northeast corner of the country, decided this was the time to establish itself as an independent republic. Luis Companys, president of the state, announced: "Catalonia is breaking off relations with the rest of Spain. I demand complete discipline from everyone." He called on Gen. Domingo Batet, commander of the garrison at Barcelona, to swear allegiance to the new regime, but that wily soldier sparred for time, and before an hour had passed he received orders from Madrid to declare a state of siege. His troops battled with the Catalans, and soon had Companys and his fellow leaders cooped up in the presidential palace. Reinforcements for the government forces arrived swiftly by land, sea and air.



Luis Companys

Then the artillery opened up, and after the palace had been thoroughly shelled, Companys and his colleagues surrendered and were marched to a prison ship in Barcelona harbor. The revolution was over and the new Catalan republic went out of existence. It was rumored the collapse was partly due to a dispute between Companys and former Premier Manuel Azana, a co-leader in the revolt. Azana was found in hiding and arrested.

Surrender of Companys did not end the fighting in northern Spain, for the revolutionists in various regions continued their desperate efforts, but the government considered the revolt really had been suppressed. There was no telling how many had been killed or wounded, but certainly the casualty lists were terribly long.

GEN. DOUGLAS MAC ARTHUR, chief of staff and now in command of the G. H. Q. combat air force and also of the ground forces, is planning to develop a fighting fleet of super battle planes. The first step will be the organization of the G. H. Q. air force of at least 1,000 planes grouped in five "wings" based on both coasts and in the Middle West. This would bring the army corps up to about 2,300 planes, making an aerial fighting fleet approximately the equal of any in the world.

GOV. GIFFORD PINCHOT of Pennsylvania has in the past been in sympathy with much of President Roosevelt's program, but he has now definitely broken away by coming out in favor of the re-election of Senator David A. Reed, anti-New Deal Republican whose defeat would be most welcome to the administration. Immediately after Pinchot announced his stand in a speech at Wilkes-Barre, Postmaster General Farley conferred with Mr. Roosevelt and then, as chairman of the Democratic National committee, gave out a stinging attack on Pinchot. In it he referred to Senator Reed as "perhaps the most outstanding foe of the President's policies," who, if elected, would "do everything in his power to hamper the President's program and to make a misdeal out of the New Deal."

Gov. Pinchot

It is said that the Pennsylvania Democrats are importuning the President to take a hand personally, and perhaps make a speech in the state, in an effort to win over rock-ribbed Pennsylvania and retire Senator Reed in a defeat which could also be construed as a slap at Pinchot and Andrew W. Mellon.

GOVERNMENT crop benefit checks for more than $352,000,000 have been paid to farmers participating in the production adjustment program, according to figures compiled by the AAA. Some $575,000,000 additional is scheduled for payment under programs now in effect, nearly 60 per cent of it before the end of this year. Thus, the farmers' stake in the AAA approximates $1,000,000,000.

Payments already made or to be made before January are included in the estimate of the bureau of agricultural economics which places 1934 cash farm income at about $6,000,000,000 compared to $5,000,000,000 last year and $4,333,000,000 in 1932.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has made it plain that the Civilian Conservation corps, one of the least criticized features of his recovery program, is to be continued indefinitely. He wrote to Robert Fechner, director of the corps, saying:

"I have been greatly interested and encouraged by the fine report from your visits to CCC camps in many parts of the country.

"This kind of work must go on. I believe that the nation feels that the work of these young men is so thoroughly justified and, in addition, the benefits to the men themselves are so clear that the actual annual cost will be met without much opposition or much complaint."

Mr. Fechner had reported to the President that the cost of the CCC during its eighteen months of operation had amounted to $443,000,000.

THERE is an interesting report circulating in Wisconsin, especially in Madison. It is to the effect that President Glenn Frank of the University of Wisconsin is looking toward the Republican Presidential nomination in 1936 and that this idea explains his refusal to permit Lloyd K. Garrison to remain in Washington as head of the national labor relations board.

The Madison Capital Times said it understood Doctor Frank feels the Republican party is in need of a "liberal" candidate, yet not a "dangerous" liberal, and believes he is in a position to qualify.

To interviewers Doctor Frank declined to comment on the newspaper story. He said his insistence that Garrison return to his duties as dean of the law school was solely in the interests of the university.

RHODE Island Republicans are quite satisfied with Felix Hebert as senator and have renominated him. For governor the state convention named Gen. Luke H. Gallan, a veteran of the Spanish-American and World wars.

USE of the taxpayers' money for the government operation of factories in competition with private enterprise was condemned by the board of directors of the National Association of Manufacturers, which acted on petitions received from seventeen large trade associations. The manufacturers assert that such government experimentation merely results in depriving employees in private industry of their jobs, creating employment at one point and unemployment at another.

"Entrance of the government into the manufacturing business in competition with its own citizens," says the manufacturers' statement, "even to supply relief for the unemployed, constitutes an extravagant use of the taxpayers' money in further experimentations.

"Where those in distress cannot be provided with either public or private work for which they could be paid, then public funds may legitimately be used to provide relief of actual need on a subsistence basis. But to furnish necessities required through government operated factories is the wrong way to do the right thing."

CONFERRING with the full membership of the new national industrial recovery board headed by S. Clay Williams, President Roosevelt let it be known that he was far from satisfied with NRA enforcement in the past and asked the board to devise more vigorous and effective methods.

Price-fixing and production control were discussed but not at length and with the general understanding that, although price-fixing policies of the Johnson regime would be reversed on paper, no sweeping action would be taken to upset existing codes and any action at all would come slowly.

ATTORNEY GENERAL CUMMINGS has called a national conference to discuss crime which is to open in Washington December 3 and continue three days. President Roosevelt is to address the first session in Constitution hall. The conference will be invited to give broad and practical consideration to the problem of crime in these principal aspects:

1. Causes and prevention of crime.
2. Investigation, detection, and apprehension of crime and criminals.
3. Criminal courts and prosecution.
4. Detection, parole, probation, and pardon.

"THE voice of Hauptmann is the voice I heard in the cemetery that night when the $50,000 ransom was paid," said Col. Charles A. Lindbergh to the grand jury in Trenton, N. J., after he had listened to the suspect in the kidnaping and murder case. The grand jury accepted this as clinching testimony and returned an indictment against Bruno Hauptmann, charging murder.

The words "Hey doctor. Over here, doctor" were spoken by the man who got the ransom money from Lindbergh's intermediary, Dr. John F. Condon. They were spoken in the cemetery where the payment was made. Lindbergh heard them and remembered the voice.

Although the case is invariably referred to as the "Lindbergh kidnaping," the grand jury returned no kidnap indictment. Kidnapers may only be sentenced to life terms. Murderers face the electric chair.

DELEGATES to the American Federation of Labor convention in San Francisco adopted unanimously and with cheers a resolution proposing adoption of a six-hour day and five-day week for all workers, private and government.

William Green

A committee appointed to investigate possibilities and merit of shorter work periods reported favorably.

William Green, president of A. F. of L. made an impassioned speech in favor of shorter work periods during which he said the federation can be expected to mobilize its economic strength to make a concerted drive on industry and owners of industry for adoption of a six-hour day and five-day week and that legislation by congress would be sought at the forthcoming session so that there will be enforcement of this economic reform, not to make less work for those already employed but to create work opportunities for more people.

Resolutions as adopted provide for no reduction in wages to result from shorter work periods.

John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers, won a victory when the convention voted unanimously for the organization of workers into single unions embracing whole industries, as distinguished from craft unions limited to particular trades. The executive council was instructed to issue charters for the creation of national and international unions in the automotive, cement, aluminum and other mass production industries.

The council also was ordered to inaugurate organization campaigns in the iron and steel industries.

The federation also went on record in favor of pensions for the aged, for mothers of dependent children and for sickness and unemployment benefits.

DIGNITARIES of the Roman Catholic church from many lands and pilgrims by the hundred thousand gathered in Buenos Aires, Argentina, for the thirty-second International Eucharistic congress. Ship after ship entered the harbor laden with pious folk from Europe, Africa and all the Americas, and the city threw open its homes for their accommodation. The picturesque open air ceremonies were held in Palermo park, and other religious rites were celebrated in the magnificent cathedral.

Minneapolis—Property owners of Minneapolis next year will have to pay a tax of nearly one cent on the dollar of assessed valuation it appears as the board of estiate and taxmation prepared to take final action on the city's tax rate. The state rate has been fixed at 11.95 mills for areas outside the Twin Cities and Duluth and at 11.80 mills for those cities. This is the highest rate in state history. For the outside areas it is an increase of .89 mills over this year and for the cities an increase of .88 mills. This boost, plus the maximum levy of 23 mills set by the school board and the demands of public relief made an all-purpose tax rate for Minneapolis of 99 mills a certainty.

St. Paul—Minnesota's big game hunting season will be opened in 16 counties for the taking of deer for 11 days, from November 15 to 23, inclusive, the state conservation commission decided. Taking of deer will be permited in the following counties: Cook, Lake, St. Louis, Carlton, Pine, Aitkin, Crow Wing, Cass, Itasca, Koochiching, Hubbard, Clearwater, Beltrami, Lake of the Woods, Roseau and the western half of Marshall from a line extending from the north to the south even with the northern border line of Kittson county.

A Little Bit Humorous

DEMAND FOR NOVELTY

"What we need," said the emphatic citizen, "is some new laws."

"Maybe you're right," answered Senator Sorghum. "Even a law can grow old and convey the impression that it has outlasted its usefulness."—Washington Star.

In a Tough Spot

The taxi came to a halt. The fare descended a trifle uncertainly and proceeded to search his pockets slowly.

"Sorry, old man," he asid, finally, "but I haven't a bean!"

Seeing that the driver was not taking it too well, he added:

"That's the position, old man, and you know you can't get blood out of a stone."

"No," agreed the driver, rolling up his sleeves, "but what makes you think you're a stone?"—Province (Vancouver).

Long-Range Enjoyment

"Does your boy Josh enjoy work?"

"Yes," answered Farmer Corntossel. "He can sit on the fence an' see people work for hours. I dunno as I ever see anybody that seemed to get more enjoyment out o' work than he does."

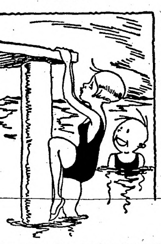
News for Pa

"Father, why doesn't mother travel with the circus?"

"Why what could she do in a circus?"

"She might be the strong woman. I heard her telling grandma this morning that she could wind you around her little finger."

HESITATION FATAL



"The woman I marry has to accept me on the spot."

"If she didn't she would never accept you—'Twouldn't do to think it over."

Or Else He Gets Fried

It is considered a sign of intelligence and will power to keep as mum as an oyster.

And yet, what good does it do the oyster to keep mum?

He's always getting in the soup, isn't he—or she or it? Whichever it is.—Cincinnati Enquirer

Around the Corner

"There have been some high words exchanged around the Capitol."

"Much to my disappointment," said Senator Sorghum. "As we keep zig-zagging along, we continually find that asperity is just around the corner."

Double Eggs

The small daughter of the home was greatly excited over a large double-yoked goose egg which had been found in a nest. The next time she hunted eggs, she exclaimed:

"Oh! Daddy, look! Here are two hens in one nest; are they going to lay a double egg?"

A Supposition

"Some of us congressmen are thinkin' a great deal we don't say," said the representative from Shuckville.

"Didn't know it could be done," answered Farmer Corntossel. "Allus s'posed your specialty was saying a great deal you didn't think."

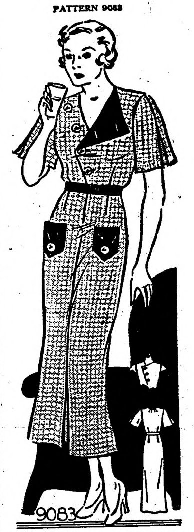
Practical House Frock

PATTERN 9083



The nice thing about this frock—one of the nice things—is that you can wear it buttoned up some days and opened on others. If you face the rever with a contrasting color, as in the illustration, it makes a great deal of difference whether you see the inside of it or not—it really makes a different frock of it. It is one of those house dresses which may be worn out of doors in the country or for shopping in the mornings. The inverted pleat makes the sleeves most flattering. Very attractive in a plain fabric as well as a printed one.

Pattern 9083 may be ordered only in sizes 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46. Size 36 requires 4 yards 36-inch fabric and ¾ yard contrasting.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Send your order to The Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 232 West 18th Street, New York, N. Y.

DETERMINED SOLICITUDE

"I'm goin' to keep on sendin' my boy Josh to college," said Farmer Corntassle.

"You think he has exceptional intelligence?"

"No. Confidentially, I don't think he has a great deal of sense. I'm goin' to put him in the way of learnin' a lot of long words so's maybe he can fool people."—Washington Star.

Sure Thing

Mother—You have been canoeing with young Sapleigh every day this summer. Is he eligible as a husband?

Daughter—Mamma, he's a cinch. His father never takes a vacation and Percy is his only child.

"I wonder why it takes pay day so long to come around?"

"It only seems long when you're short, and the shorter you are the longer it seems."

She Now Says "Introduce"

"Mr. Smith, let me present Miss Jones," said the hostess.

"Thanks," he smiled, "she looks like a gift any man would be proud to receive, but I'm afraid my wife would object to my taking her home."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

A Hint

Manager—Pat, you wear a very old-fashioned coat in the office.

Clerk—Yes, sir, it is a bit out of date. I bought it the last time you gave me a rise.—From Ireland's Own.

ENGEN
For Superintendent
Of Schools

We have worked through hard times together

My program has been:

1. To build up the incomes from state sources. (This is the only income tending to equalize costs between the school districts of the state.)
2. To direct the buying of essentials and to keep fads and frills out of the schools.
3. To build up regularity in grading and promotions. (Our standards are the same as the graded schools.)
4. To build up the school libraries to meet the needs for the required reading.
5. To improve regularity of attendance by emphasizing its value rather than through criminal prosecution.
6. To give the rural school grauate an adequate foundation for carrying on high school work should he attend.

If re-elected I propose to carry on the same program and to enrigh the activities as much as may be without saddling a burden on pupils and teachers.

I assure you that your vote and support will be appreciated.

Psychologist Declares Flapper's Dizzy Days Over

Farewell to the flapper. Her dizzy days are over. Comely she was, and full of pep. But she knew little or nothing about brakes, and she has skidded out of sight, according to Dr. Ernest L. Talbert, psychologist at the University of Cincinnati. In fact, the little miss is so far outmoded that one might almost expect a return of the staid days when the McGuffey readers were the standard literature of the family, says the Literary Digest.

Doctor Talbert based his studies on the character of magazines over the years since the flapper walked on the stage and took her last cue. "Several recent studies of American life from 1890 on show startling changes," he reported to a discussion group at Cincinnati. "A statistical investigation of articles printed in periodicals reveals a preoccupation with the changing conditions surrounding the family, with divorce, birth control, and sex morals. Approval of more modern habits show an upward curve from 1922 to 1929.

"Since then comes a drop. A more conservative tone appears. The reign of the flapper is over. Periodicals of wide circulation are more conventional and severe in their professed code than the intellectual organs and women's magazines."

Villages Buried by Sand on Lake Michigan Shore

Giant sand dunes that travel by day and night have overcome and almost obliterated a number of small towns that once dotted the eastern shore of Lake Michigan. At Grand Haven, a few rotting piles are all that is left of the once extensive warehouses, docks and trestles of a railway and steamer terminal. Happy Hollow, the village in a small valley high in the hills back of a terminal where the workers lived, was abandoned half a century ago. Twenty years ago some of the roofs still could be seen, but they are gone now. Mills, camps and docks have disappeared along with villages.

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a faculty position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer meets Prof. Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy. At the school the group is struck by an air of mystery pervading the place. Gordon Haskell, proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne completes the Academy faculty. In a schoolroom Janet finds a group which the teachers had supposed were scholars, are wax figures. Haskell explains unusual circumstances connected with the conduct of the Academy. Among the pupils is Berenice Bracebridge, daughter of the late owner of the school. The story of the tragedy of Lostland Academy is that of two sisters and two brothers of Berenice, who lost their lives in the water, at the same moment, some years ago. The wax figures were modeled in the likenesses of the four children, and Doctor Bracebridge's will provided that they must be preserved. Payne learns from Berenice that the uncouth giant whom Janet had seen with Haskell is named Balder, and is a valuable servant. From an old farmer, Jerry Moore, the only witness of the drowning of the children, Payne learns particulars of the tragedy. He begins to take an increasing interest in Berenice, as Fleming does in Janet.

The head of Lostland academy seemed inordinately fond of flowers, and, as Mrs. Denver came down a path to take the air, he gallantly gathered a bunch and handed them to her. She took them shyly, then her face lighted up with pleasure as she saw the quartette approaching. Balder in the distance rested on his hoe and watched the scene. The evening wind was blowing cold from the lake and a moaning began in the pines. Payne noticed a black glove lying on the white gravel of a side walk. The wind grew wilder. All at once the bell high up in the belfry struck one note. Haskell started violently, and Mrs. Denver almost dropped her flowers.

Berenice said: "I am sure it is Mother Martha, Guardian. You know she likes to think the boys and girls are coming back to school."

"I remember the rope does run down through the end of the passage where she lives. But I didn't know she had strength enough in her old hands to pull the rope. Wilton, what do you think of our chrysanthemums? I can't do much here—but these plants take care of themselves."

Again the bell sounded. Balder ceased to stare at them and resumed his work.

"Some one has dropped a glove," Mrs. Denver remarked, and picked it up.

"It's Mother Martha's," said Berenice. "Look, Janet—may I call you Janet?—she knits these black gloves herself, and puts them on—"

Haskell frowned. "Now, Berenice, don't reveal your old nurse's eccentricities."

"It isn't an eccentricity to mourn—is it? She wears them on the anniversaries of people's deaths! What can it be today! Ah, I remember—my brothers and sisters!"

Haskell turned with a kind of anger to Janet. "There, you see I did what I could to divert her mind—away with sad anniversaries, I say! I hope you will be happy this evening! Go into the library, build a fire. Go down into the kitchen and make fudge. I'll tell the cook you are to have anything you like. Wilton, are you too grave a psychologist to make fudge?"

Wilton was thinking he had misjudged Haskell, who certainly had his problems in managing an estate so freighted with old tragedies and traditions and so involved with the future of a girl as charming as Berenice. He approved Haskell's effort to keep this anniversary from the girl's mind. "You'll come, Mrs. Denver—to this party?"

"Indeed I will!" she answered heartily; then in a lower voice, "May I walk a little with you, Mr. Payne? I want to ask you something."

"Have you seen the lake?"

"No."

He turned in that direction. She came along gratefully, huddling her rather worn coat of Hudson seal about her and glancing from time to time at her companion's face.

"How we all walk here! It seems as if everybody hated to be indoors. You are a psychologist, Mr. Payne. Tell me what is wrong with this house?"

"Ah, you've been thinking too much of these—figures of the old, sad story."

She lowered her voice, looked about her cautiously. "It's a story that's not finished—"

"Are any stories ever finished?" he said gently.

"It's not finished! You'll think me strange—I have a feeling we were brought here to finish it—we—unconquerable four!"

"I'm glad you include yourself. It means you'll stay."

"Yes, I'll stay! I want to go—but I'll stay! I'm afraid of Balder, of Mother Martha, of the principal with his queer bright eyes; but I'll stay!"

At the door which led into the basement he left her—and descending the mossy stone steps he found himself in the passage where the wax figures were lodged. A new keyhole containing a key had been let into the door.

He heard some one on the basement stairs, and stepped inside the room beyond that in which were the wax figures. As a further precaution he stepped into an empty closet the room contained. By leaving the door ajar he could see the other door and the passage.

Haskell entered swinging the new key in his hand. He looked about a moment, spied a loosened brick in the fireplace, drew it out, thrust the key in the aperture, and locked it up again. "Balder will never find that," he muttered.

Payne waited until the quick footsteps died away, then he stole out feeling like a criminal, but sure, nevertheless, that he had a legitimate curiosity in this matter. Haskell's putting on the new lock seemed natural enough, however, as a protection to the figures from the idle eyes and fingers of the shy scholars or from Balder's apparently impish desire to play tricks with them.

Finding Arthur in his bedroom smoking the black pipe which was his darling, he related the recent circumstances, winding up by a retrogressive process with the account of his visit to the Moore farm.

"Do you believe that old farmer's story?"

"Yes—why not?"

"He was the only witness of their deaths—"

"And their drowned bodies?"

"That's so! I always forget they are buried in the little graveyard. They seem so intensely alive I expect them some day to come upstairs and join my scholars."

"Haskell does, too—judging by the new lock. Do you know what thought was in my mind down at the old church?"

"The same that was in mine, I suppose—that Haskell in the dim light thought Berenice—"

"Exactly. She is so like the younger one—Isabel—that it is startling. Haskell was frightened—plain frightened. I hope he won't come in to our festivities this evening. But I am afraid he will!"

"I believe, Wilton, he's jealous of your growing influence over Berenice. She likes you, and there's nothing would please him less than—"

"And myself more. If your sharp eyes have also discovered that I am devoted to Berenice Bracebridge, I shall not deny it."

"Janet—and I both think—"

"I am comparatively poor—and she is rich, or will be."

"What's the odds, if you are fond of each other."

"The important thing now is to protect her."

"From what?"

"That's just it," Payne answered helplessly. "I don't know what the danger is—but there is a danger. I feel it in those black basement rooms, in the stiff sad drawing room, in her own fear of the place as if she were only safe sitting close to little Isabel or with her arms about Althea or Norman. Why did you start so?"

"Let's go down!"

"You can't take your pipe downstairs."

"I hate this room! Come along."

At dinner, Payne asked Gordon Haskell some questions about the old house. After dinner, continuing in the same strain, he inquired: "Was Arthur Fleming's room ever assigned to the boarding pupils?"

"No. Why do you ask?"

"I was just wondering. It's a very nice, large room."

"It was young Jethro's for a great many years; then the four children used it for a study room. Berenice had it for a while, but gave it up. She said the furniture creaked so! All old furniture does!"

"Yes, Fleming says the furniture creaks."

The evening plans included first the making of the fudge in the great barrack of a kitchen. The cook, and the rather sullen young man who had brought up their trunks, were seated near the range, and watched the proceedings with unfeigned interest. The old man who had driven the car up wandered in and began to upbraid the other servitor for his matchless incompetence.

"Ah, shut your mouth! Nobody told me to saw that wood. Balder's job—not mine."

"Much chance I'd have for kindling from that great lummox; always hanging around where he ain't no business to be!"

"Oh, well, he's teacher's pet. He could set fire to the old rat trap and Haskell would say nothin'."

Payne almost let the great iron spoon drop in the pan of fudge he was stirring. Janet and Berenice, picking meat from hickory nuts, did not raise their heads; nor evidence in any way that they heard this colloquy of servants. They were deft workers. Arthur had a fleeting thought that all men contemplating marriage should see the woman of their dreams once, at least, against the background of the kitchen.

The candy came to perfection, and was put in a window to cool. The four, two of them feeling that they had renewed their childhood, went up to the library, where Haskell, true to his promise, had made a fire. Mrs. Denver was knitting a red sweater by the light of one of the lamps set liberally about to overcome the gloom. She looked up with an air of relief as they entered.

"I'm glad you've come. The servants seem to be all downstairs, and I can't get used to this big house."

Haskell appeared in the doorway—"All comfortable, all set?"

"Won't you come in, Guardian?"

TO BE CONTINUED.

TRUE DETECTIVE STORY

The Man Who Hit the Bull's Eye

MOONSHINING flourished long before the prohibition amendment was made to the Constitution of the United States.

Twenty years ago it was carried on in the mountains of West Virginia on a scale that made the government authorities gasp for breath.

The general impression of the moonshiner is that of a poor white man who is willing to take big chances in order to make a little illegal money.

This is true of some sections, but at the time mentioned there were bold and unscrupulous distillers who carried it on as a business in a big way and who made fortunes by the operation.

Wayne Gooch was one of these men.

He was called "the King of the Moonshiners," and there is no reason to doubt that he was entitled to the distinction.

The scandals grew to such proportions that the commissioner of internal revenue at Washington determined it would have to be stopped at all hazards.

The man he assigned to the job was a fearless agent named Tom Kennedy.

He had several advantages. One was that he knew the mountains of West Virginia.

Another was that he was a crack shot.

These things were important, because the moonshiners placed small value on human life.

Most of them boasted that they would not be taken alive, and by the same token they would kill anyone who attempted to interfere with their business.

Kennedy determined to confront the lion in his den.

He made up his mind to go to the Gooch stamping grounds in the guise of a government forester.

Merely to be known as a person who was connected with the government in any capacity was taking a big chance, but Kennedy was a man who had been taking chances all his life, and one additional chance meant litttle to him.

He had two capable assistants with him, and he went direct to the cabin where the king of the moonshiners made his headquarters.

He introduced himself by his real name, and he wanted to know what the authorities could do to help the cultivation of trees in that part of the country. Gooch, who was a big, bluff fellow, received him cordially enough, even though he kept his weather eye on this curious stranger.

He said the soil in that part of West Virginia was not particularly adapted to forestry, but he cheerfully offered to escort Kennedy about the country.

It was just what the revenue agent wanted.

He kept his eyes and his ears open, and at the end of 24 hours was forced to confess that there was not even the sign of a still in operation.

During that time the king entertained the agent in a royal fashion.

One day they had a shooting match, with a big target set up near the cabin. Kennedy participated, and to the great delight and admiration of the king the visitor hit the bull's eye nine times out of ten.

Gooch said that was the best record ever made in that locality.

He parted with his guest with apparent reluctance.

Kennedy had played his cards so well that he was not even suspected by the king of the moonshiners.

They parted one night with expressions of mutual esteem. Kennedy had no misconception of his man.

He knew that if his true character had become known he would have been shot down like a dog.

This thought keyed him up to the game he was about to play.

He left the cabin and the vicinity, but he had proof that distilling was going on on a great scale.

He discovered that the stuff was sent to the depot in a truck at about midnight each night.

So he lay in wait with his two men and when the team arrived at a certain part of the road he appeared in the highway with a loaded and primed revolver.

The driver and his assistant, taken unawares, surrendered.

In the meantime, Kennedy sent for re-enforcements and before another day had gone by the king of the moonshiners and his men had been taken into custody.

Counterfeit Wampum

Counterfeit wampum came into being with the white man's arrival in America when a family of European immigrants of Paskack, N. J., with the aid of steel drills and lathes, became proficient in making wampum from the cheap, plentiful shells of the common Busycon conch of the Gulf coast. This counterfeit Indian money circulated as far west as the Mississippi valley.

Hawaii, lying in mid-ocean just within the tropics, has a warm climate throughout the year, though high temperatures are prohibited by the northeast trade winds, which blow for about nine months of the year. The mean annual temperature is 71.5 degrees. The extremes are 54 degrees and 89 degrees.

Satisfy Urge to Investigate

The Young Child Seeks an Understanding of Things Through His Own Efforts.

By EMMA GARY WALLACE

The young child is an investigator on his own account. He picks up a small toy or any other article within his reach, feels of it, turns it over, and, as likely as not, he carries it to his mouth. He is seeking an understanding of the world around him through his own efforts.

But soon, his natural hunger for facts is not completely satisfied by what he can find out for himself, and he begins to ask endless questions. Many of these are singularly searching, even penetrating. They show that the child is doing real thinking and is eager to hear the explanations of those around him.

Such questions as "Where was I before I came to live with Mother?" or, "How do the little chickens get inside the eggs?" reveal a mind reaching out for causes.

Only a little later, there seems to be a natural desire for collecting. It is one way that the children satisfy their hunger for facts and comparisons. This love of collecting is usually at its peak from eight to ten years of age, and wise indeed is the parent who has been leading up to this time tactfully and constructively.

The child whose questions are not answered frankly and in an honest and satisfying manner will cease asking questions freely, or he will seek information elsewhere.

It is at this time that the foundations are laid for a happy companionship betwen parent and child. If father and mother show a genuine interest in the little one's desire for facts, a family confidence is established which is priceless.

It is a mistake to try to go more deeply into any subject, by way of explanation, than the child can comprehend. A lengthy and tiresome explanation wearies the small child. The power of attention will increase as the child develops; it should not be forced. But a true answer should be given to the extent that the child can grasp it.

"Why does the frog jump?" Tommy asks.

"See, dear," his mother points out, "the frog's legs are not like yours and mine. He needs the kind of legs he has, and four of them, to get over the ground and through the water. When he was a baby, he didn't have legs. They hadn't grown yet. But he had a tail and he was called a tadpole."

Oysters Eaten in Eighth Century Before Christ

Let us not leap to conclusions. The discovery of the shell remains of an oyster banquet that was probably held in a village near Sparta in the Eighth century before Christ proves only that oysters were being eaten by men at that time—not that the Spartans discovered the edibility of the oyster.

The hero who, in fear and trembling, first swallowed an oyster and wondered if he was poisoned, probably lived long before Sparta was even contemplated. He may have been a shipwrecked Tyrian sailor; he may have been some hungry beachcomber even before the men of the Eastern Mediterranean launched ships. Perhaps he was a cave-dweller who watched a seabird carry a clam aloft and drop it on a rock to smash its shell. We shall never know, but we can continue to be thankful to him whenever the R months come around and we seat ourselves before a steaming stew.—Detroit News.

Why the Sudden Change to Liquid Laxatives?

Doctors have always recognized the value of the laxative whose dose can be measured, and whose action can be thus regulated to suit individual need.

The public, too, is fast returning to the use of liquid laxatives. People have learned that a properly prepared liquid laxative brings a more natural movement without any discomfort at the time, or after.

The dose of a liquid laxative can be varied to suit the needs of the individual. The action can thus be regulated. It forms no habit; you need not take a "double dose" a day or two later. Nor will a mild liquid laxative irritate the kidneys.

The wrong cathartic may often do more harm than good.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is a prescription, and is perfectly safe. Its laxative action is based on senna —a natural laxative. The bowels will not become dependent on this form of help. Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is obtainable at all druggists.

Several people from here attended the Decade of Progress celebration in Thief River Falls over the week end. The Holt Community Band played at the great parade that was staged in that city on Wednesday evening.

There were several outside hunters here on Sunday to hunt partridge in the woods. The birds are not very plentiful here this year.

The heavy rain of last week put a lot of water in some of the ditches and freshened up the water in the small lakes.

A young fellow from the Twin Cities who was out peddling last minute campaign literature for Gov. Olson was bumped off of the highwaw in town here on Monday. It appeared as if he was in a hurry the way he was speeding thru town and he held to the middle of the road until a man with a new Plymouth car came along and rammed him from the rear when he refused to get over on his side after being warned by the horn of the car that wanted to pass. The Ford coup the young fellow was driving was damaged so much that it had to be taken in tow to the garage at Thief River Falls.

HOME RAMBLES

Party lines are being followed as closely as possible in in the county politics this year by some of the candidates There are probably those who feel that they should support the big boy on Capitol Hill.

Rev. L. M. Redal left on Wednesday for Philadelphia where he was called because of the serious illness of his mother.

To the Voters of the 5th Dist.

Next Tuesday it will be your duty to decide on the candidates who will serve you for the next four year. Before casting your ballot it is your duty to decide on the person who will serve you best as Commissioner of the 5th District. I have my record of the past four years.

I am the owner of 440 acres of land in Marshall county, therefore I am very much interested in the amount of taxes levied, which is one thing you should consider.

If elected for another 4 years, I promise to serve you fairly and and impartially and to the best interest of the 5th District and Marshall County.

I thank you
O. J. Johnson.

Had Smashup Sunday

Elmer Norhe, farmer living three miles west of town had his model T ford coup all smashed up early Sunday morning when a truck belonging to Art Stodahl of Gatzke hit him on the intersection a half mile north of town. Both rigs were going north when the accident happened. Mr. Nohre, as it appeared, turned to go west to his place just as the Stordahl truck, which was returning home from Fargo with a heavy load of lumber on, was about to pass him. Mr. Nohre's ford was rolled over and badly busted up while the truck ended up in the ditch with very little damage done to it. No one was hurt.

Circle 5 gave a hallowe'en party to circle 6 and the other ladies in town at the Lutheran Church parlors Wednesday evening. The guests came dressed in hard time costume of which Mrs. Jim Peterson took the prize.

A delicious lunch was served and an enjoyable time was had by all who were there.

Anton Rodahl shipped out a car of baled straw this week.

Lloyd Larson who is employed at the Marvin Sandberg farm had his right leg lacerated quite bad on Wednesday when a horse he was riding ran into a barbed wire fence. He was rushed to the hospital at once for treatment.

IN MEMORIAM

In memory of our dear husband and father, Syver Nohre who passed away one year ago, Nov. 7, 1933.

Ti's hard to lay from out our sight
The form we loved so well
To know that with us on this earth
He never more shall dwell.

Could we but look beyond this vale
Where it is ever bright
Where our bright day to loved ones there
Would seem as darkest night.

Could we but see the joy beyond
With loved ones gone before
The smiles that always welcomed us
Beam from that other shore.

We will not wish him back again
To days of toil and pain
Back to the sad and lonely ones
Whose loss is but his gain.

The hands that toiled so patiently
In happy days of yore
The heart that loved so tenderly
Has only gone before.

In fancy now we hear him sing
The new songs of that land
In honor of his Lord and King
Amid that happy band.

Mrs. S. H. Nohre and children.

Once our county was nearly bankrupt, but today we are in good financial situation; we pay cash as we go on every fund except the poor fund, and it will not be long before we pay cash as we go on that fund. Our 1935 tax year should show a considerable decrease in county tax. I am greatly interested in the welfare of our county and its people, and I would like to continue working for the county and its people for another term.

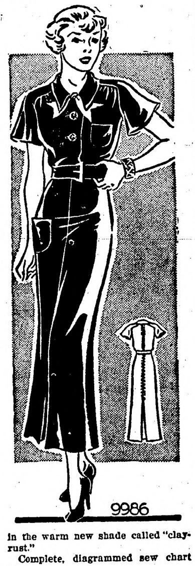
"Shirtmaker" Frock

PATTERN 9986

The vogue of the shirtmaker frock has been carried right over into the autumn, but the new members of this popular family are a trifle less severely tailored than those one has seen in all smart places during the summer. Here is an excellent example of what we mean—with chic short epaulet-like sleeves and soft gathers. You can make it of a fabric as formal as you may wish. It would be as smart as Paris in black with crystal buttons and a white satin knot at the throat. Or perhaps you would prefer it in crepe morocain in the warm new shade called "clay-rust."



Complete, diagrammed sew chart included.

Pattern 9986 may be ordered only in sizes 14, 16, 18, 20, 32, 34, 36, 38 and 40. Size 16 requires 3½ yards 39-inch fabric and ⅝ yard 1½ inch ribbon for bow.

Send FIFTEEN CENTS in coins or stamps (coins preferred) for this pattern. Be sure to write plainly your NAME, ADDRESS, the STYLE NUMBER and SIZE.

Send your order to Sewing Circle Pattern Department, 232 West Eighteenth Street, New York, N. Y.

Kidnaped Louisville Woman Ransomed for $50,000—Jugoslavia's Murdered King Buried—Collective Bargaining Plan of General Motors.

T. H. Robinson, Jr.

LOUISVILLE'S sensational kidnaping case came to a climax with the return of the victim, Mrs. Berry V. Stoll, to her home. The young society matron had been held captive for six days in Indianapolis by Thomas H. Robinson, Jr., a maniac who had twice been held in insane asylums. She was treated rather roughly but not really injured, and was set free after Mr. Stoll paid $50,000 ransom. Robinson fled with all but $500 of this sum and a country-wide hunt for him was at once begun. His wife and father were arrested, charged with complicity in the kidnaping. Mrs. Robinson, however, was said to have protected Mrs. Stoll to the best of her ability and it was she who returned the abducted woman to her relatives, abandoning her crazy husband.

In Detroit one Edward Lickwala, a youth with a police record, was arrested for attempting to extort $5,000 from Edsel Ford under threats of death. He was promptly indicted by a federal grand jury, pleaded guilty and was sentenced to serve ten years in the Leavenworth penitentiary.

WITH overpowering pomp and ceremony Alexander I, assassinated king of Jugoslavia, was laid to rest with his fathers, the founders of the Karageorgevitch dynasty. Nearly every nation on earth was represented at the funeral rites. King Boris of Bulgaria and King Carol of Rumania were there, as was President Lebrun of France. King Victor Emmanuel of Italy was represented by the duke of Spoleto, and Chancellor Hitler of Germany by Gen. Hermann William Goering, premier of Prussia, who flew from Berlin. England sent Prince George, now duke of Kent. Other notables present were Prince Cyril of Bulgaria, a delegation from Poland, Foreign Minister D. Maximos of Greece, Foreign Minister Dr. Tevfik Rustu Bey of Turkey, Foreign Minister Dr. Eduard Benes of Czechoslovakia, Foreign Minister Nicholas Titulescu of Rumania, Prince Nicholas of Rumania, and Undersecretary of Justice Karl Karwinsky of Austria, with many others.

Belgrade was thronged with many thousands of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes. One entire village of 900 peasants arrived from Herzegovina, a picturesque crowd many of whom had sworn not to shave for three months in token of their grief.

For two days Alexander's body lay in state in the palace while the people passed by the bier. Then it was removed to the cathedral for requiem high mass, after which there was a two mile procession to the railway station. From there the body was conveyed to Topolo, 53 miles from the capital, and interred in the family mausoleum.

FRENCH police having caught three of the companions of "Kalemen," really Tschernocemskz, who slew Alexander and Louis Barthou in Marseilles, the authorities of half a dozen countries were making progress in unravelling the assassination plot.

From the confessions of those captured and from the investigations of the police of France and Belgrade it was learned that Kalemen was a notorious Macedonian terrorist named Valda Georgeff Tschernocemskz who killed two Bulgarian political leaders several years ago. He and his associates in the plot were directed in their murderous work by a mysterious "master mind," and the authorities assert this man, whom the assassins knew as "the doctor," controlled the activities of several distinct terrorist bands who were ignorant of one another's moves.

Dr. Ante Pavelic, described as the leader of the Croatian terorists, and Eugent Kvaternik, his aid, were arrested in Turin, Italy just as Alexander was being buried in Jugoslavia. Kvaternik was known as the "delegate" and was supposed to have acted as liaison man for Pavelic, making contact with the Marseilles assassins.

The police had hunted them throughout Europe. Kvaternik was trailed as far as the village of Etaples in France, where the trail was lost. Pavelic, however, was known to be in Italy, and the search turned there, on the theory that the two would get together.

Continental police were still hunting for Maria Vjoudroch, blond siren, who is supposed to have smuggled into France the murder weapons, and Gustav Perchec, alleged to have conducted the Croatian exile "murder farm" at Janka Bufta, Hungary, where the assassins held target practice.

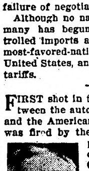
Premier Doumergue's French cabinet was considerably changed as a result of the tragedy in Marseilles. Albert Sarraut, minister of the interior, and Henri Cheron, minister of justice, resigned and were replaced respectively by Paul Marchandeau and Henri Lemery. Laval was made minister of foreign affairs to succeed Barthou and his place as minister of colonies was given to Louis Rollin.

FRANCE lost another of her elder statesmen in the death of Raymond Poincare, who was president from 1913 to 1920 and returned later to public service as premier. It was during that period that he seized the Ruhr in an effort to compel Germany to pay the war reparations to France. Poincare was born in Lorraine, and that fact explained in part his unrelenting attitude toward Germany in dealing with postwar problems. Entering political life in 1887, he was mixed up in many prominent "affaires" and made a record as an intense patriot and a liberal republican. In 1926, when he was called out of retirement, he succeeded in saving the country from its disastrous financial state. Poincare was seventy-four years old when he died, and had been in poor health for some years.

SECRETARY OF STATE HULL is vexed by what he calls the "indefensible practice" of certain countries in boosting tariffs or other restrictions to obtain concessions by reducing them again in negotiations with the United States for trade agreements. He made a statement about it, intimating that under such conditions there may be a failure of negotiations.

Although no nation was named, Germany has begun a program of controlled imports and has denounced its most-favored-nation treaty with the United States, and France is increasing tariffs.

FIRST shot in the coming contest between the automobile manufacturers and the American Federation of Labor was fired by the General Motors corporation in the form of an offer to its 130,000 employees of its own plan for collective bargaining. In a letter sent to every worker President Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., said: "We of the General Motors recognize 'collective bargaining' as a constructive step forward, both for the employees and the management. Regardless of any obligations that may exist, we propose not only to continue the idea, but to develop it."



A. P. Sloan, Jr

The plan, which actually is already in effect, was designed to meet all requirements of section 7A of the National Industrial Recovery act. Though the company in its communication did not mention the A. F. of L., it declared that "membership in a labor union or other type of labor or employee organization does not in itself establish the right of any such union or other organization to represent employees in collective bargaining negotiations. Representatives for such purpose must have been specifically chosen by the employees they are to represent and the fact of such choice must be established."

Employees must be given complete freedom in setting up collective bargaining organizations and choosing representatives, the company declared.

The management may, however, assist any employee organization in plans for employees' mutual benefit, provided that in the determination of the right of employees to participate in the benefits there is no discrimination by management on the ground of affiliation with any labor organization.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT went to Williamsburg, Va., and took part in the ceremonies attendant on the inauguration of John Stewart Bryan as president of the old College of William and Mary. In return for his courtesy Mr. Roosevelt was given the honorary degree of doctor of laws. The same honor was conferred on Gov. George C. Peery. The exercises were conducted in the reconstructed main building of the college, designed by Sir Christopher Wren.

On the same day took place the formal rededication of Duke of Gloucester street, the city's main thoroughfare, which has been restored nearly to its original appearance as the last major construction project of the restoration of colonial Williamsburg. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., financial backer of the restoration which already has cost approximately $15,000,000, was among the distinguished visitors present, along with cabinet members, congressmen, diplomats and educators.

ALL the members of the German cabinet took the oath of loyalty to Chancellor Hitler at their first fall meeting, and then Dr. Hans Heinrich Lammers, chief of the chancellery office, announced that "Adolf Hitler is fuehrer for life." He added that the Weimar constitution no longer exists. Many laws were decreed by the cabinet to carry on Hitler's policies. These included laws reducing the tax burdens of the big families and the cost of tax administration, laws reorganizing cooperative associations and "purifying the auctioneers' trade," laws altering bankruptcy sales, reorganizing the traffic in grain "to enable the National Grain company to control grain even when the harvest is reduced."

REPUBLICAN senatorial candidates in five states have incurred the displeasure of organized labor, and President Green of the American Federation of Labor has called on the members to work for the defeat of those men in the November elections. The five are Senators Reed of Pennsylvania, Walcott of Connecticut, Hatfield of West Virginia and Fess of Ohio, all seeking re-election, and George M. Bourquin, Republican nominee in Montana.

Circular letters signed by Green review the records in congress of Reed, Walcott, Fess and Hatfield. They say the candidates voted against the 30-hour work-week bill, for reduction of federal salaries, for the sales tax and for confirmation of Judge John J. Parker of North Carolina to the Supreme court after he had upheld what union men call the "yellow dog" contract between employers and workers.

Each letter reminds the members of the federation's declaration to "stand faithfully by our friends and elect them; oppose our enemies and defeat them."

ORGANIZED labor doesn't like S. Clay Williams, chairman of the new national industrial recovery board recently appointed by President Roosevelt. At the San Francisco convention of the American Federation of Labor, a resolution was adopted demanding an investigation of Mr. Williams' attitude as vice chairman of the board of the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco company of Winston-Salem, N. C., the charge being that he was opposed to trade unions and to collective bargaining with them. The federation's executive council instructed President William Green to present the matter to Mr. Roosevelt on his return to Washington, and he promised to do so. Incidentally, it should be recorded that Mr. Green was re-elected president without opposition.

S. Clay Williams

It is not considered likely that the federation will get far with its fight on Mr. Williams. He was deliberately selected for membership on the board because his conservatism will be a foil to the comparative radicalism of other members, especially Sidney Hillman and Leon C. Marshall. The other two members, Arthur D. Whiteside, head of Dun and Bradstreet, and Walton Hale Hamilton, are rated as moderately conservative.

The new board is hard at work on the problems which beset the NRA. It has devised methods for quicker transaction of business and has strengthened the subordinate executive personnel, and, in the matter of enforcement, it has agreed not to interfere in labor disputes, these being relegated to Secretary Perkins and the labor relations board.

TO THE White House correspondents President Roosevelt said that a federal housing program with a great many ramifications undoubtedly would be submitted to the next congress and also would constitute an important part of the administration's future relief policy.

The President expressed approval of the latest undertaking of the Federal Emergency Relief administration, which is to develop small communities of from 100 to 500 families. The families are taken off the direct relief rolls and moved into small houses, where they are intended to become self-supporting on communal farms provided by the government.

NAZI dictatorship over religion in Germany was bitterly attacked by 16,000 Protestant pastors from their pulpits, despite the presence in every church of secret police and spies. The congregations cheered and shed tears as they were told that a crisis in the rebellion against the tyranny of Reichsbishop Mueller was nearing a crisis.

Mueller and Dr. August Jaeger, commissioner of Protestant churches in Prussia, were held responsible for the "triumph of violence and hypocrisy" in a manifesto distributed to congregations.

"Through Mueller and Jaeger Satan does his work," the manifesto said. "The church regime has nullified the gospel. It has violated the constitutional church government, and is using political force to gain its end.

"It splits Bavaria's unified church into two parts, but still it talks of unity. It denies the Ten Commandments and employs lies against truth and robbery against justice. Still it talks of Bible and creed.

"Caprice and falsehood have gained the upper hand in the church."

NEARLY fifty persons lost their lives in a typhoon that swept over Manila and nearby provinces of the Philippine islands. Property damage in the city was estimated as high as $2,500,000, and undoubtedly was heavy in the country.

TWELVE hundred coal miners at Pecs, Hungary, won a sensational fight for better wages, risking their lives on the outcome. They imprisoned themselves far underground for days, declaring they would die there voluntarily unless the employers would raise their pay, which had been only $2 a week. Food sent down by their friends was returned, and many of the men were crazed and nearly dead before the company was forced by the government to make a settlement the workers would accept.

The owners agreed to eliminate a wage cut, to raise the working time from two to three days a week, and to pay a bonus of $3 a man to help tide over the winter.

The Important Thing

Being good isn't the road to heaven; it is doing good.

THIS CHANGE gives Children a Chance

Perhaps you have tried nearly every sort of way to keep a child's bowels in proper condition, and failed.

Yet, almost any child who has been convalescing in a hospital, will usually come out with bowels working like a well-regulated watch.

The average mother gives any laxative the family may be using, while doctors give children a liquid laxative of suitable ingredients, suitable strength, and in suitable amount.

Make the change now to pure, California Syrup of Figs instead of harsh medicines, you risk no more violence to your child's appetite, digestion, and general physical condition. You'll have a safer, more satisfactory result, too. Those little upsets and complaints just disappear and the child is soon normal again. Try it!

THE "LIQUID TEST." First: select a liquid laxative of the proper strength for children. Second: give the dose suited to the child's age. Third: reduce the dose, if repeated, until the bowels are moving without any help at all.

An ideal laxative for this purpose is the pure California Syrup of Figs, but be sure the word "California" is on the bottle.

ENGEN

For Superintendent
Of Schools

We have worked through hard times together

My program has been:

1. To build up the incomes from state sources. (This is the only income tending to equalize costs between the school districts of the state.)
2. To direct the buying of essentials and to keep fads and frills out of the schools.
3. To build up regularity in grading and promotions. (Our standards are the same as the graded schools.)
4. To build up the school libraries to meet the needs for the required reading.
5. To improve regularity of attendance by emphasizing its value rather than through criminal prosecution.
6. To give the rural school graduate an adequate foundation for carrying on high school work should he attend.

If re-elected I propose to carry on the same program and to enrigh the activities as much as may be without saddling a burden on pupils and teachers.

I assure you that your vote and support will be appreciated.

Nanking Permits Widows Freedom of Remarriage

Another step in the emancipation of Chinese women has been recorded by an order issued at Nanking by the Kiangning Hsien, or district government. Under this order a widow has complete freedom of choice whether she shall remarry or remain single.

Under the old custom a widow could remarry only under direct orders of the family of her late husband. In the Kiangning district it has been customary for families to force a widow to remarry in order that they might recover the money which her late husband had paid out to her family when she was a bride.

Worth Waiting For

America's most voluminous patent was granted to the inventor of a calculating machine on August 4, 1931, nearly nineteen years after the application was filed. It comprises 245 pages—including 40 of drawings and 99 of specification—and makes 975 claims.—Collier's Weekly.

Why Doctors Favor a Liquid Laxative

A doctor will tell you that the careless use of strong laxatives may do more harm than good.

Harsh laxatives often drain the system, weaken the bowel muscles, and even affect the liver and kidneys.

Fortunately, the public is fast returning to laxatives in liquid form. The dose of a liquid laxative can be measured. The action can thus be regulated to suit individual need. It forms no habit; you needn't take a "double dose" a day or two later.

Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin gently helps the average person's bowels while nature is restoring their regularity. Why not try it? Some pill or tablet may be more convenient to carry. But there is little "convenience" in any cathartic which is taken so frequently, you must carry it with you, wherever you go!

Its very taste tells you Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin is wholesome. A delightful taste, and delightful action. Safe for expectant mothers, and children. At all druggists, ready for use, in big bottles.

SYNOPSIS

On her way to a faculty position in Lostland Academy, Janet Mercer meets Prof. Arthur Fleming, also on his way to the Academy. At the school, they are struck by an air of mystery pervading the place. Gordon Haskell, proprietor, welcomes them. Wilton Payne completes the Academy faculty. In a schoolroom Janet finds a group which the teachers had supposed were scholars, are wax figures. Haskell explains unusual circumstances connected with the conduct of the Academy. Among the pupils is Berenice Bracebridge, daughter of the late owner of the school. The story of the tragedy of Lostland Academy is that of two sisters and two brothers of Berenice, who lost their lives in the water, at the same moment, some years ago. The wax figures were modeled in the likenesses of the four children, and Doctor Bracebridge's will provided that they must be preserved. Payne learns from Berenice that the uncouth giant whom Janet had seen with Haskell is named Balder, and is a valuable servant. From an old farmer, Jerry Moore, the only witness of the drowning of the children, Payne learns particulars of the tragedy. He begins to take an increasing interest in Berenice, as Fleming does in Janet.

—14—

"Not tonight. Don't forget to put out the lamps when you go to bed."

"I'll see to it," Janet said.

"You won't come in, sir?" Payne asked. He had noticed Haskell's reluctance on other occasions to linger in that library.

"No, I have work to do—in my room."

Berenice looked after him with a speculative, half maternal air. "I hope when I'm off his hands he'll enjoy life a little."

"Must everything go on like this until you are twenty-one?"

"Or until I marry—if I marry before I am twenty-one. Then the guardianship—trusteeship—passes to my husband until I am twenty-one—then to me absolutely."

Mrs. Denver laid down her knitting. "My child, why don't you marry?"

A nervous silence followed this remark. Payne put his hand over his eyes as if to shade them from the light, and Arthur and Janet looked like people at a play just after the curtain has gone up. Mrs. Denver resumed her knitting. Berenice stirred the fire—and great tongues of flame sought the black case of the chimney.

Then, feeling strangely juvenile together and as if skirting the dark wood of fate, they drew around the fire telling stories.

Then Payne said, "Someone must be delegated to get fudge."

"I'll go," said Berenice, rising.

"I'll go with you."

"No, please."

Payne waited; gave her a little start, then followed her. At the foot of the staircase she turned, not toward the kitchen, but toward the room where the figures were kept.

"Berenice," his voice had a stern yet tender quality. She started violently, looked back. "Oh, why did you come?"

"Because I thought you might do this. You watched the door too much."

"I was getting afraid again—I suppose the anniversary and Mother Martha's tolling the bell depressed me—I wanted to see their dear faces—be kept from thinking they could ever harm me. It's a foolish fancy—but it came, and I thought I would look in there first before I got the fudge."

He walked with her down the passage. "Will you take one of the lamps from the brackets?"

He lifted it down. She turned the handle. "Why, it's locked, and there's a new lock! Oh, he must give me the key; he must!"

"Don't you think it's just as well to have this room locked? The figures are safe from prying eyes and meddling hands—and I am sure your guardian will give you a key."

"He may not. He is very firm at times."

"Maybe he thinks it's better for your health and spirits not to go there too much."

"Perhaps he is right—and after all—now you will think me foolish again, there was something else beside fear. I suppose I've been like a little girl with her dolls who doesn't want them to be lonely or unhappy, even though she knows they are not alive."

Later in the evening she showed him some old diaries kept by her father. "I've often thought they ought to be published; he put down so many comments on current events, as well as the academy news. Would you look over them for me some time—and tell me what you think could be done with them?"

He promised her to look through them. The four had played cards, eaten fudge, chatted, with Mrs. Denver placidly knitting in the background. They thought her quite adorable in her faculty of being with them without any of the middle-aged strictures on their impulses of the moment. They had a common unspoken feeling of being in a play. The wind sweeping wildly from the mountains rattled the heavy window frames and swayed the maroon rep curtains softly. They had a sense of empty rooms and hidden projects about them. Berenice forgot even that she had ever felt fear in the place—though the ever-present mystery was still sharply with her.

CHAPTER V

When every one but himself had gone to bed, Payne sat down to read the diaries of the late Dr. Jethro Bracebridge, but he had no intention of going back to the earlier years first, on the track, as he was, of the situation in Lostland academy just before the deaths of the four Bracebridge children. It was easily traced, as the diaries ended abruptly on the twenty-ninth of September of the year of the drowning. On that fatal day, Doctor Bracebridge had ceased his records, never to open them again.

He evidently had been a man of deep scholarship, and of what is sometimes missing in conjunction with scholarship—broad and deep sympathies. In one place he had written:

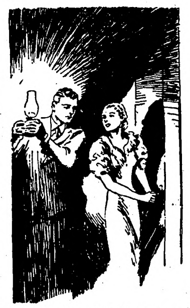
"The thinker is sometimes more likely to go astray in his conclusions than the warm-hearted man of action. Education should never be carried beyond the point where it stultifies spontaneous and generous deeds. Life was meant to be loved out; not thought out."

Payne turned back to the approximate date of Doctor Bracebridge's second marriage, and found this entry:

"Mrs. Haskell is a dear woman—most lovable. I would not be surprised if after our marriage, Berenice did grow to love her as her own mother. The child is only four."

The first mention of Gordon Haskell rather surprised Wilton:

"Well, he arrived at five to take up his new duties; and I must confess I am disappointed in him, though whether this first feeling will wear off, and a heartier one take its place, remains to be seen."



"Oh! He Must Give Me the Key; He Must!"

Two weeks later:

"Jethro announced to me that he disliked Gordon Haskell, and did not intend to be his student. I remonstrated with him, but the lad, with all his fine qualities, is at times hotheaded and obstinate. Althea, Norman and Isabel show this aversion to Gordon; apparently only little Berenice likes the poor fellow. She allowed him to take her on his knee yesterday and hear her say her letters. Poor baby! Education at present interests her but slightly."

Six months later:

"I intend to appoint Gordon coguardian with Mrs. Bracebridge, in case of my death, over the five children. I shall, of course, provide for him, too; though not in the measure I do for the others. I am sorry the youngsters hate him so, for it leads to a series of minor outbreaks between them. Privately I think Gordon a rather savage teacher; some men are like that—too impatient of a pupil's limitations! I have asked him to be more gentle and more nonchalant with his scholars. Children as a rule respect and like people who are rather casual toward them. The intense adult is their abhorrence. Perhaps they know better than we do that a rage for reshaping life is not according to the sweet reasonableness of the divine policy. Gordon is ambitious! I doubt greatly if he cares to bury himself long at Lostland academy; so the children and their arch-foe may be separated naturally."

In the last year, Gordon Haskell's name appeared very seldom. Doctor Bracebridge evidently had other things to worry him—an epidemic of measles in the school, and a series of thefts, particularly one large sum from the locked drawer of a desk in the library. In another place was written:

"I am afraid it is Balder; a sullen, disagreeable fellow, but as he does twice the work, when he chooses, of an ordinary man, it doesn't seem right to dismiss him merely from prejudice or the suspicion of something we can't prove. I've given up trying to reconcile my incomparable four and Gordon. That, too, is a temperamental matter, and with such chemistry, one does well not to meddle."

"Poor man. It would have been better if you had meddled," Wilton reflected. "Those boys and girls probably diagnosed Haskell's character better than you did!"

TO BE CONTINUED.

Recalling Rule of the Druids

Scotland Has Many Spots Where, It Is Believed, the Weird Brotherhood Held Their Sacrificial Ceremonies in Oak Groves.

In ancient Celtic days certain feasts were celebrated by great bonfire ceremonies. In more recent times it was the custom for country girls to rise early on summer mornings and go out and bathe their faces in dew, writes Nan Muirhead Moffat in the Glasgow Herald. In pre-Christian days, however, it was not always to a young woman's advantage to be good looking, for, if she attracted the attention of the Druids, her beauty might lead her to the altar—not of love but of death.

The weird brotherhood, who held their councils in groves of oak trees, had a curious hold over the people.

They considered themselves seers, scientists, and philosophers, and instructed their young followers in the study of nature and the stars. Among them the bards were the hymn-makers and poets.

The word of the order was law, for the Druids were judges in private and public disputes; they awarded damages and penalties, and, although non-military men, often decided for war or peace. With them excommunication was a terrible punishment, for it meant that the expelled person was excluded from witnessing the sacrificial ceremonies and regarded as an outlaw.

Now, when a tribe was suffering from an epidemic, or was about to engage in some hazardous enterprise, the Druids offered human sacrifices to propitiate their gods. Generally criminals were made the victims, but if a battle-sacrifice was required, the first prisoner of war was considered the most suitable. Sometimes perfectly innocent persons were slaughtered, and on certain important occasions the most promising youth and maiden in the community were chosen.

Scotland has several sites where, tradition says, the Druids were wont to hold sacrificial meetings. There is, for example, the altar stone of Callernish temple, in Lewis. Also at the Serpent Mound, Skelmorlie, a French excavator claimed to have discovered a hillock built up by the Druids in a form resembling a coiled snake, and having on its summit a semi-curcular platform, on which, presumably, the ceremonies were performed.

The name of this mound may also be connected with the veneration with which the reptile was regarded by the Druids—the exact opposite view being taken by their supplanters, the priests of Christianity, who looked on the serpent as the original form assumed by the devil.

On Craigmaddie moor, Baldernock, near Glasgow, are three large stones supposed by some archeologists to have been brought there by glaciers, and later used by the Druids as an altar. The stones—two of which support the largest, which is 18 feet long, 11 feet broad, and 7 feet thick—are centrally situation in a natural amphitheater on the hillside and are known locally as "The Auld Wives' Lifts."

As Craigmaddie's ancient name, "Gartna-Beannachd," means "Field of Blessing," and as remains of the roots of oak trees, which might have formed a sacred grove, were found near the Lifts, the belief in their association with the ancient priests seems credible.

It is a "far cry" to the dark ages of the Druids, but even today, in remote and secret places of the earth, black magic is still practiced.

HOME RAMBLES

A very large crowd of farmers and others from this community came in to town Friday evening for the annual community festival sponsored by the Holt Commercial Club.

A program of short talks, music, songs, lunch and smokes was put on for the folks at the school house. The Holt Community band furnished music. George Fricker was the chairman and gave the greeting of welcome from the business men. J. P Augustine, President of the local creamery board spoke for the farmers and Mrs. Fred Peterson gave a response for the ladies of the community.

Rev. Fjelstad, pastor of the Trinity Church, Thief River Falls gave an interesting talk and stressed the fact that the people of this community have a lot to be thankful for and happy over this year as in comparison to the people of other sections of the country where there is next to starvation because of the drought.

After the entertainment in the schoolhouse some of the folks took in the dance at the community hall.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Wilson of Ryder, N. Dak., arrived here this week with two carloads of sheep, horses machinery and household goods and have rented the Olaf Ness farm out in Mud Lake and moved there this week. The Wilsons were completely dried out in the western part of Dakota and had to move. The News joins the people of this community in extending them a warm welcome to Holt.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Peterson and Mr. and Mrs. H. Grant and son of Thief River Falls visited at the Iver Larson home Sunday afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Larson and daughter Shirley left for Minneapolis Tuesday. While there their little daughter will undergo an operation. David Sandberg accompanied them to receive medical treatment.

Deer Season Next Week

Minnesota's big game hunting season is scheduled to get under way next Thursday, November 15, at which time hunters may start out in the quest of deer and bear. The season will close November 25. Both dates are inclusive.

The counties that are open this fall to deer hunting are Cook, Lake, St. Louis, Carlton, Pine, Aitkin, Crow Wing, Cass, Itasca, Koochiching, Hubbard, Clearwater, Beltrami, Lake of the Woods and Roseau, all that portion of Kittson and Marshall counties lying east of the Soo Line railway tracks running from the northern boundary of Kittson county to the southern boundary of Marshall county, and all of that portion of Becker county lying east of the Soo Line railway tracks running from the northern to the southern boundary of that county.

Itasca county is open to the taking of antlered male deer only. Does and fawns are given complete protection in this county.

A person may take one deer and one bear at any time during the open season. Full protection is accorded moose, elk and caribou.

"Deer are reported as being plentiful in the areas open to big game hunting", Erling Swenson, director of the division of Game and Fish, said. "Most of the sections open to deer hunting were outside the critical drouth are and deer as a consequence have had plenty of food and cover.

"Hunters are cautioned to abide by the game laws when hunting as the open areas will be thoroughly patrolled by state game wardens. We are transferring a large number of wardens from southern and central parts of the state into the big game sections, not only in open counties but in counties which are closed and are known to have some deer.

"It must be remembered that hunters must accompany deer that are being transported home. Failure to do this will mean confiscation of the deer."

Resident big game hunting licenses cost $2.25 each and non-resident licenses for the taking of deer and bear cost $50.25.

Mr. and Mrs. G. Sanoden motored to Eldred, Minn. to visit relatives Sunday.

Advice of Inspectors

Quality is a very important factor in the production of cream, with inspectors inspecting all butter that comes on the market, for foreign matter such as flies and other things that may get into the cream, which may result in a total loss of some churnings. Let's all work hand in hand to prevent such happenings.

Election Returns

Just before going to press we called up the County Auditor's office in Warren and got the returns for one of the hottest elections and hardest fought political battles ever staged in the history of Marshall county. Up to 1 o'clock yesterday, all but three of the sixty precincts in the county had filed their returns and the three remaining ones of which Moose River township was one, have not enough votes to change the tabulations much.

Over six thousand Marshall county voters went to the polls on Tuesday to cast a vote in favor of their best candidates.

State Senator: O. S. Nordine received 2480 votes in Marshall county and Richard Rice 3177. Nordine carried Kittson county. Rice was the winner when the Roseau returns came in.

The first figure represent total vote, second figures village vote.

Mud Lake Project To Start

Work affecting about 30,000 acres of the proposed Mud Lake wild migratory bird nesting ground and refuge in northwestern Minnesota will be started this fall. This initial work will include the western section of the area in which are located both Olson lakes and Mud, Greenstump and Elm lakes. Most of the development structures and improvements are needed in this section. Plans and specifications for the entire 75,000-acre project will be furnished by the U. S. Bureau of Biological Survey.

Following a survey last week by J. C. Salyer, in charge of land acquisition for the Biological survey, and S. H. McCrory, chief of the Bureau of Agricultural Engineering, U. S. Department of Agriculture, it was reported that federal funds of several hundred thousands of dollars are available, indicating that the project is regarded as one of the most important units in the restoration of wild life.

"The Mud Lake project is strictly a federal one with the dual purpose of aiding wild life and retiring sub-marginal lands from farm operations," E. V. Willard, Commissioner of Conservation, said. "Payment for lands and improvement costs will be made with federal funds with the Department of Conservation cooperating."

To "Swear Like a Trooper"

So popular has this expression become through the centuries that we are likely to accept it as a general allusion to the usually unmaidenlike speech of soldiers—without wondering whether it might not immortalize the speech of some particular troopers in the world's history. The fact is that the phrase was originally "to swear like a trooper in Flanders," an allusion to the habits acquired by the English troops in Flanders. The simile comes to us from Richardson's "Pamela," which dates 1741.

To Keep in Mind for Cake Making

Light Use of Mixing Spoon Is Highly Advisable, Expert Says.

In order to make cake well there are certain things which should be remembered, and followed. One is to handle the mixing spoon lightly. It will help to think of the ingredients as delicate or foamy. The expression "fold in the beaten egg whites" indicates that they are not to be roughly, but delicately treated, lest they lose their feathery texture.

While the ingredients, such as sugar, flour and butter, are solid or of close consistency, they are expected after the cake is made and baked, to come out light. "As light as a feather" is the term often applied to fine cake of certain kinds. It will fail to warrant such a recommendation unless the ingredients have been handled lightly. Certain ingredients should be beaten, rather than stirred, while others should be whisked into the mixture.

Another essential to good cake making is to measure quantities accurately. Avoid guessing. When a quarter cup of butter, or half a cup, is stipulated, see that the butter is patted down into the cup to make the right amount. Do not melt the butter or whatever shortening is used, unless so directed, for cake made with creamed butter is of a different texture from that made with melted shortening. The recipe will say if the latter is wanted, otherwise use it unmelted.

Level spoonfuls are meant in modern recipes unless rounded or heaping spoonfuls are given. To level a spoonful of contents draw the blade of a knife over the top, seeing that the knife touches the edges of the spoon while so doing.

Ingredients should be mixed in the order stated. When the order is not given it is assumed that the ingredients will be put together as follows: Cream sugar and butter, add beaten egg yolks and flavoring, then flour and liquid alternately, beating in each one before adding another quantity. Last of all, fold in the beaten egg whites. If the eggs are to be added without beating, as in pound cake, it will be so stated, and how many to add at one time. If eggs are to be beaten but not separated, this will be stated.
